To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Religion Producing Epidemics.

The reappearance of the influenza in Bucharest, Vienna, and Berlin at this time, when reports of sweeping epidemics among the destitute in the interior of Russia are coming out of that country, has revived interest in the theory which found much favor last year, that this disease had its origin at the Russian shrines and monasteries, where great crowds of pilgrims assemble annually under conditions which cause and nourish infectious disease. The New York Times recalls that the influenza began its course in the interior of Russia and moved from that country westward. In those parts of Russia where millions are now suffering from the direst poverty and from want of food, the conditions certainly favor the development of pestilence, and it is very probable that the influenza has been revived there, to be carried into the adjoining countries on the west by refugees and in other ways.

It is not difficult to find support for the theory that this mysterious and terrible malady has its birthplace in Russia, just as cholera has its home in India. In both cases the infection spreads through the agency of religious gatherings and pilgrimages. The annual outbreaks of cholera at Mecca and the holy places near the mouth of the Euphrates threaten all Europe, and the influenza engendered in the dirty huts of a colder clime is said to become epidemic at the holy places where the devout and destitute masses of Russia invite plagues of all kinds.

The persistent neglect of the simplest rules of sanitation by millions of people in any part of the world threatens the safety of the clean and the enlightened elsewhere. No considerable part of the human race can persistently and uniformly violate those rules without endangering the well-being of all mankind. In the field of national sanitation and decency "the injury of one is the concern of all." The "sanitary progress of India" was one of the subjects that engaged the attention of the recent Hygienic Congress, but the reports submitted to the congress indicated very little progress except with respect to the death-rate in the British army and in certain parts of some of the cities. The obstacles seem insurmountable. Millions of wretched human beings, whose habits are almost incredibly filthy, who use the same tank as a receptacle for all their sewage and as a reservoir from which their supply of water is taken, who poison the soil of their towns until there is no remedy except the abandonment of the sites, and who regard with religious abhorrence those who advise any change, cannot be reformed in a decade. Yet they must be reformed. We cannot allow these superstition-cursed hordes to kill us off now with epidemic any more than we could permit continuance of their former practice of murdering us with fire and sword. These people must hav their bigotry enfeebled and their common sense strengthened. The Mohammedans must be shown and reshown the folly of believing the Prophet inspired, and the Russian Christians must hav dinned into their ears the impossibility of their creed, till both cease flocking to their scenes of religious celebration under conditions so generativ of disease. The priests who vend shrine- and faith-cures and denounce hygienists must be unmasked, derided, and supplanted. The people must be taught to respect scientific teachers, the only ones who are capable of doing good.

And yet other points of Christian management must be altered. Epidemics may be furthered and spread not only by unsanitary concourse as remarked above, but by innutrition and other privation among a people. The famin in Russia has already either caused or aided many epidemics, and before it ends may produce great plagues little less dreadful than those of medieval Europe. And this famin is due to Christianity. This religion has, both by its direct operation and by its indirect operation as pillar of a tyrannical government, kept the Russians destitute of knowledge, improved implements and methods, independence, self-help, and every quality or resource by which the comparativly Freethinking peoples maintain their plenty.

Indeed, for what evil is religion not responsible? Turn where we will, some pernicious effect of it stares us in the face. There is no safety or rest for mankind while there remains on the face of the earth one being with the accursed folly in his brain.

Christ's Kingdom: Its Peaceful Establishment

That ancient lie that Mohammed's religion prevailed by the sword while Christianity was spread by peaceful means, having been so thoroughly exposed, we might think it unnecessary to speak of it at all, but of late it has been resurrected and sent broadcast through some modern essays, conspicuously through one of the Chatauqua series by a Mr. Muir, LL.D., etc., entitled "The Rise and Decline of Islam." "The armies of Islam conquered a nation and gave them the choice of accepting the religion of the Koran, paying tribute, or being put to the sword." And then he contrasts this method with the peaceful conversions by which Christianity was extended over other nations. Let us see! An army conquers and its commander offers to the conquered the choice of "religion, sword, or tribute." An emperor conquers or inherits the greater part of the known civilized and uncivilized world, and commands all his subjects to embrace Christianity, punishes those who refuse to obey, rewards and favors all who comply. The one is force; the other is moral influence. All the writers of the age—the fourth century—agree as to the main facts. It will suffice to quote Sozomen, whom no one will accuse of prejudice against Christianity. He lived and wrote while all the events were yet fresh in the memory of some surviving actors in them. He says that Constantine after his conversion by the vision of the cross with the letters, "Conquer by this" (conquer, mind), had the standard called Laburnum changed into a cross. "He did this chiefly, that by having it always in view and worshiping it, the soldiers might be led to abandon their old superstition and recognize the true God as their leader and helper in battle; for this symbol was always borne in front in the thickest of the fight." See chapter iv.

In chapter viii he says: "As soon as the sole government of the Roman Empire devolved on Constantine he issued a decree commanding all the people of the East to honor the Christian religion." He said that "God having accounted him worthy to reign he had been led from the British seas to the Eastern provinces in order that the Christian religion might be extended and its followers advanced to public honors. After making these statements he entered upon other details." He then goes on to show what these were. As the result of these details Sozomen says: "Christians were thus placed in almost all the principal posts of the Roman Government, the worship of false gods universally prohibited. He built churches and repaired others and furnished all with supplies and enjoined submission everywhere to the hierarchy. He made war on the Sarmatians and Goths, and when he had vanquished all he evinced his thanks to Christ by zealous concern to the business of religion and exhorted all the governors he placed over the vanquished to recognize the one true faith and way of salvation. He levied funds off all the tributary nations for the support of the bishops and other clergy. He marked the weapons of his soldiers with the sign of the cross to familiarize them with the new religion, and built houses of prayer for them and also carried a tent for worshiping in on their march and took priests along to perform services. Each legion had its own tent and its priests and deacons. He also enjoined the observance of the Lord's day, the day the Greeks devote to the Sun. He forbid all labor, etc., on that day because our Lord rose on it."

And those were the peaceful means by which Christ's kingdom was established.

The Extension of Morals.

While pietists lament an imaginary laxness in morals which they say is spreading with the Infidelity of the age, the fact is that application of, and obedience to, the moral criterions, are steadily increasing. As an instance of this, the London Spectator points out that the class of monarchs, heretofore allowed to cut their capers quite above the interference of public opinion, are being brought under amenability to the moral standard like all other classes. They are judged like other men, and will no more be permitted to be separate in their manner of life or "peculiar" in their characters than other men are, or at least not without exciting resentment and disrespect.

On the continent, for example, the reign of an acknowledged mistress over a court, the Pompadour régime, has become next to impossible.

We doubt if an emperor could get drunk openly without directly shaking his authority, and are quite certain that conspicuous miserliness, a frequent foible among the very rich, would immensely diminish general respect. It is injurious to a king now to be even particular about money, though a hereditary foible of that kind largely helped to build the throne of the Hohenzollerns; but it is also injurious to be extravagant, especially in any unusual or inartistic way.

A king may even now waste a third of his life in hunting, as Louis XIV. did, because the world still hunts; but he may not gamble, because the world, though it gambles, holds encouragement to gambling to be a sort of superfluity of naughtiness.

He must be polite, too, and that on occasions when to private individuals some privilege of moderate discourtesy would possibly be allowed. The queen-regent of Spain, for example, is one of the best as well as ablest of the princesses of Europe, and she thinks it her duty to protect the throne of her little son until the time when he can mount it himself. It is her business, therefore, to be royal, her responsibility, so to speak, as trustee; and as she was born an archduchess of Austria, and is harrassed every day by republicans, she probably holds persons of those opinions in an almost religious dislike. Yet the democratic newspapers think it quite horrible that she should recently hav passed Senor Castelar, the leading republican of Spain, without any ceremonial recognition of his presence. She ought, it is felt, to hav suppressed all external manifestation of distaste, and hav perceived in Senor Castelar only the chief of all Spanish orators and a leader of many men.

Even eccentricities in manner are resented, and a sovereign would hav to be very popular before a habit of going bareheaded, or of wearing unusually easy hats—a whim of Frederick the Great—or of walking faster than his courtiers, would be cordially forgiven him.

The German emperor is the most popular of sovereigns, and almost independent of Parliament; but he is spoken of injuriously, because he measures his words by his own will and not by that of his subjects, and because, having much too many things to do, he has a passion for rapid driving.

The modern monarch, in short, so far from being the freest, promises to become the least free of mankind, and will hav, if he values or needs public favor, to keep strictly within the ropes, and liv the the life held to be least worthy of comment by those whom he is supposed to rule.

Whatever the cause, the fact is certain, that princes in constitutional countries will in future be required to observe the rules of conduct approved by their subjects, under penalty, first, of being actually disliked, a position intolerably painful to all but a very few; secondly, of being refused all their requests—and kings hav many requests to make—and, thirdly, of being compelled to vacate their thrones. That fate has fallen on five sovereigns or heirs-apparent in our time and in only one of the five cases could any reason be assigned other than personal conduct. Amadeo of Spain was, we believe, compelled to abdicate solely from the popular dislike of a foreigner, he himself being a very fair king who would hav governed well; but the other four—the duke of Brunswick, Queen Isabella of Spain, the crown-prince of Holland, and Dom Pedro of Brazil—were all dismissed on account of failures in conduct, which in the first three of those named were most grave, but in the last amounted only to eccentricity.

To tell the truth, the control over monarchs' lives which the public has come to exercise, bids fair rather to transgress on the side of zeal overmuch than to fail by slackness. It is disputed by many Liberal writers that the public has the right to concern itself with any man's private affairs with the closeness above instanced. But without entering upon that point here, we will content ourselvs with calling Christians' attention to the fact that as their religion is passing away morality is not being weakened, but on the contrary becoming strengthened at a rate unprecedented.

Liberty vs. Paternalism.

Speaking of some reforms wrought by the activ young emperor of Germany, the New York Sun reflects: "Nothing but the very soundest grounding in democratic principles suffices to restrain the citizen of a self-governing community from wishing that it might borrow an emperor of activ mind for a few months. How the elevated railroad managers' heads would swim, and cable railroad constructors take to their beds of pain after Commissioner Gilroy and District Attorney Nicoll had been favored with one imperial interview. What searching ordinances would the frightened aldermen not enact, and how would the startled police flit like gigantic chimney-swallows enforcing them. How would the ferries be encumbered with building inspectors, lost in a crush of builders, fleeing from the wrath to come. Pallid grand jurors would hand out indictments in sheaves; nor would four days be needed to impanel a trial jury, either, if a committee of an imperial legislativ body loomed in the background charged to inquire into judicial procedure and report." But the judgment of this paper, rarely unsound, does not fail to step in at this point with considerations of a quite opposit nature, as follows: "It is a sweet vision, but it may not be. And, it may be proper to add, this ideal emperor can be relinquished with a sigh which is only one of relief when we remember all that would hav to be accepted along with him in practice; the surveillance, the censorship, the suppression of free criticism. For it must be noted to man's credit that the hardest burden for him to bear is the interdiction of free thought." This is the correct way of looking at the matter. The few goods that are conferred by paternal government are insignificant beside the many and huge evils that attend it. The blessings and glories of freedom are uncountable; the evils of state domineering are endless. It is a true observation of Professor Oswald that since the dawn of history the lands of freedom hav produced fruits and flowers that refused to thrive on any other soil. For several centuries civilization was confined to a small country of republics: Attic and Theban Greece. "Study the wonders of that age," says Byron to his friend Trelawney, "and compare them with the best ever done under masters." Switzerland, in spite of its rocky soil, has for centuries been the happiest, as well as the freest, country of Europe. The prosperity of the United States of America, since the establishment of their independence, stands unparalleled in the history of the last eighteen hundred years; and, moreover, the degree of that prosperity has been locally proportioned to the degree of social freedom, and has begun to become general only since the general abolition of slavery. Freedom blesses the poorest soil, as despotism blights the most fertil, and it is only an apparent exception from that rule that Italy continued to flourish during the first two centuries of the empire. The change in the form of government was at first nominal, rather than real, and under the rule of Augustus, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines, Rome enjoyed more real liberty than many a so-called republic of modern times. When despotism became a systematic and chronic actuality, the sun of fortune was soon eclipsed, and the social climate became as unfavorable to art and literature as to valor and patriotism. "Personal independence," Professor Oswald adds, "is a not less essential condition of individual happiness. Bondage in any form, and of silken or gilded, as well as of iron, fetters, is incompatible with the development of the highest mental and moral faculties. The genius of Poland and modern Italy has produced its best fruit in exile. The progress of modern civilization dates only from the time when knowledge once more flourished in a Republic of Letters; and for a thousand years the monastery system of mediæval literature produced hardly a single work of genius. Within the period of the last three or four generations the sun of freedom has ripened better and more abundant fruit in any single decade than the dungeon-air of despotism during a series of centuries. All foreign travelers agree in admiring (or condemning) the early mental development of American children, who hav a chance to exercise their intellectual faculties in an area untrammeled by the barriers of caste divisions and social restraints. They may yield to the pupils of the best European colleges in especial branches of scholarship, but in common sense, general intelligence, general information, in self-respect, in practical versatility and self-dependence, an American boy of twelv is, as a rule, more than a match for a continental European boy of sixteen; and the same holds good of the average intelligence and self-dependence of our country population. With the rarest exceptions the political economists of our Southern states agree that the agricultural negro as a freeman is a more valuable laborer than as a slave, and that emancipation, in the long run, has benefited the planter as well as his serf." Freedom from state control, whether that state consist of a monarch or of a majority, is the indispensable condition of every excellent work. Liberty, liberty, liberty, is the watchword that must be ever on our lips.

Life.

The admirable Edison has favored the public with some interesting views on the nature of life. When he was in Berlin, he says, he met Du Bois Reymond, and, wagging the end of his finger, said: "What is that? What moves that finger?" Reymond confessed that he could not tell; that the search of investigators for twenty-five years had failed to reveal it. Edison speaks without positivness, but hazards some conjectures. One view is that everything possesses some degree of life. "All matter livs," he says, "and everything that livs possesses intelligence. Consider growing corn, for example. An atom of oxygen comes flying along the air. It seeks combination with other atoms and goes to the corn, not by chance, but by intention. It is seized by other atoms that need oxygen and is packed away in the corn where it can do its work. Now, carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen enter into the composition of every organic substance in one form of arrangement or another. The formula CHO, in fact, is almost universal. Very well, then, why does a free atom of carbon select any particular one out of fifty thousand or more possible positions unless it wants to? I cannot see how we can deny intelligence to this act of volition on the part of the atom. To say that one atom has an affinity for another is simply to use a big word. The atom is conscious if man is conscious, is intelligent if man is intelligent, exercises will power if man does—is, in its own little way, all that man is."

Coming to the vital energy in the human system, our scientist remarks: "A beefsteak in the human stomach is equivalent to coal under a boiler. By oxidization it excites energy that does work. But what form of energy is it? It is not steam pressure. It acts through the nerve cells, performs work that can be measured in foot pounds, and can be transformed into electricity; but the actual nature of this force which produces this work—which makes effectual the mandate of the will—is unknown. It is not magnetism, it doesn't attract iron. It is not electricity—at least not such a form of electricity as we are familiar with. Still, here it is necessary to be guarded, because so many different forms of electricity are known to science that it would be rash to say positivly that we shall not classify vital energy as a form of electrical energy. We cannot argue anything from difference in speed. Nerve force may travel as fast as electricity, once it gets started. The apparent slowness may be in the brain. It may take an appreciable time to set the force going. It seems reasonable that there is a close affinity between vital energy and electricity. I do not say they are identical; on the contrary I say they are very like."

The possibility of an invention that would incomparably surpass in value any previous one made, is thus canvassed by our ingenious friend: "If one could learn to make vital energy directly without fuel, that is, without beefsteak in the stomach, and in such manner that the human system could appropriate it, the elixir of life would no longer be a dream of alchemy. But we hav not yet learned to make electricity directly, without the aid of fuel and steam. I believe this is possible; indeed, I hav been experimenting in this direction for some time past. But until we hav learned to make electricity, like nature, out of disturbed air, I am afraid the more delicate task of manufacturing vital energy so that it can be bottled and sold at the family grocery store will hav to be deferred."

This subject of life is a very interesting—indeed, a fascinating one. Rationalists may pursue its investigation with much profit and pleasure, while the benighted are learning to pronounce Beeltethmus and Elionaus, wondering why the prophecies of Habakkuk and Isaiah don't come true, and harrowing up their souls with the Five Points and other lacerativ theological growths. Büchner's "Force and Matter" would be a good book to begin with. This would be well succeeded by Spencer's "Biology" or Haeckel's "History of Creation."

Mr. Wettstein Writes About Mr. Bundy's Suit.

To The Truth Seeker Company in General, and the Editor in Particular, Gentlemen: Allow me to say through the columns of your inestimable journal that Colonel Bundy and his lawyers are slightly "off their bearings" in instituting suit for an alleged defamation of character in an article of mine under the heading, "Lincoln Not a Spiritualist," published in yours of November 7th. In the first place, said article is based upon a communication from the Washington correspondent of the Chicago News, under the heading, "No Faith in Mediums," in which said correspondent relates an interview with the former private secretary of Lincoln, John G. Nicolay, the sum and substance of which is that said Nicolay, in his capacity of private secretary, positivly denies that any séances were ever held at the White House, "dismissing the statements of the medium, Mrs. Colburn Maynard, and their corroboration by Colonel Bundy, as idle stories having no foundation in fact," also that he, the said Nicolay, "never heard of anything of the kind, and that he is absolutely positiv that nothing of the kind occurred." With these point-blank denials of the truth of the statements of Mrs. Maynard and Colonel Bundy, could the reader come to any other conclusion than that it was a scheme for the purpose of inveigling the credulous into the ranks of Spiritualism? My remarks being therefore well founded upon the Chicago News article, it is to that publication that Colonel Bundy should turn for redress, if anywhere, as its heading that Lincoln had "No Faith in Mediums" plainly indicates that he considered them humbugs, to express it mildly. And the plaintiff being known to hav been a violent opponent of Spiritualism prior to his assuming charge of the Religio-Philosophical Journal bonanza, which he was determined, after the assassination of its former proprietor, S. S. Jones, his father-in-law, to work for all it was worth, certainly looks as if but little faith could be placed in his Spiritualistic pretensions also.

But this is not the only ground upon which you can plead: no ground for action. The objectionable insinuations made by me were virtually retracted in yours of December 12th, wherein I said, under date of November 22d, that if a plausible explanation were offered why Mrs. Maynard—and by a subsequent intimation, Colonel Bundy—waited twenty-five years before projecting her, or their, book, in which they revealed to the world that "Lincoln was a Spiritualist," I would take my insinuation all back. Now, what could hav been fairer than this proposition? Here they had an opportunity to place themselvs in the right before your readers, or the world, and yet they availed themselvs not of it. They saw another bonanza in the endeavor to "mulct you to the tune of a few thousand dollars!" I placed it in their power to redeem themselvs in a very easy manner, to clear themselvs of the reflections made. It was a virtual retraction of all the charges made, if they would but giv one simple reason why they allowed a quarter of a century to pass before divulging to the world that Lincoln was a Spiritualist. And this retraction was made before notice of the complaint was served upon you. I don't know anything of the laws of your state, but if such a suit was instituted in Illinois, or I dare say in most states, the plaintiff or his solicitors would be hooted out of court.

A retraction made before any complaint is made of the alleged offense, and suit instituted in spite of the retraction—just think of it! Hav the people no right to know why twenty-five years should hav been allowed to elapse before being apprised of the Spiritualistic tendencies of our martyred Lincoln? Why has no explanation of this remarkable fact yet been given? What a pity if Mrs. Maynard or Colonel Bundy should hav passed away during these long years, and allowed their secret to be buried with them! Publishers of Spiritualistic papers are not generally slow to announce to the world the faith noted men hav in their doctrins. On the contrary, they are sometimes overhasty, as may be well remembered by many of your readers of the case of General Beauregard, who was reported killed at the beginning of our late "unpleasantness," and whose spirit communicated a message published in the Banner of Light, I believe, but said spirit not having left its physical "tabernacle" yet. Are we, therefore, not warranted in the belief that there is something decidedly "rotten in Denmark?" Waiting twenty-five years in keeping a secret, and then all at once telegraphing it to Eastern journals!

Why was this bit of news withheld from the world so long, and then sprung upon it so suddenly? I think the world has a right to demand an explanation, and with said explanation the plaintiff or plaintiffs stand redeemed. This is their natural and proper recourse, and we hav placed it at their command. Why did they not avail themselvs of it? A few plain, simple lines from Mrs. Maynard or Colonel Bundy and they would hav rendered themselvs, as far as we are concerned, as "pure as the driven snow." They would hav scattered my objectionable remarks to the winds of the heavens. They knew it, or ought to hav known it, for the virtual retraction was made and published, as I stated, in The Truth Seeker before any complaint was made to you even. If they were ignorant of this retraction, that is no extenuation in law. H. Wettstein.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

Foreign religious papers state that Emile Zola, the great French realistic writer and Freethinker, has joined the Catholic church. We suppose it is a French Sunday-school tale.

Six hundred Freethinkers assembled at Schaerbeek, Belgium, on November 15th, to witness the unveiling of a statue to the late Charles Dugardin, the Belgian Freethinker and philanthropist.

The state church in Germany is waging war against the immorality fostered by the theaters. In Germany, as here in the United States, sensible people prefer the theater, and in this fact the trouble lies.

Mr. Köster, editor of the Volkstimme, has been sentenced to four months' imprisonment for reprinting the fifty-year-old drama, "Death of Danton," by George Büchner. The drama is anti-royal and anti-pious.

Ferdinand D'Haurve, treasurer for the Freethought society, La Libre Pensée Gantoise, and one of the most prominent Belgian Freethinkers, is dead. The Secular funeral services took place November 1st.

Dr. Titus Voelkel, the exile and former editor of Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, has entirely recovered from his late illness, and returned to his duties as headmaster of his pensionate in Zürich, Switzerland.

"Mrs. Laura Friedheim has willed about twelv hundred marks to the Freethought society of Berlin," says the Menshenthum. Let American Freethinkers do likewise to our state organizations and Freethought will prosper.

Though times are hard in Belgium, and especially so for Freethinkers, our brethren in that country in the months from September 20th to November 20th succeeded in collecting 244 francs for L'orphelinat Rationaliste (Orphan Asylum for Children of Freethinkers).

The Dutch Freethought association, De Dageraad, which was founded Oct. 4, 1856, and reorganized Jan. 29, 1879, has published its annual report. It numbers at present 531 members: 206 in the Amsterdam society, 28 in that of Haag, 72 in that of Rotterdam, besides 255 general members. The society publishes a monthly magazine, De Dageraad (Daybreak), which is well edited and always instructiv. It has 615 subscribers.

It is interesting to know that the Roman Catholic church possesses, and has possessed, some very rare relics. Space will, however, permit us to mention but few: Six heads of John the Baptist, several bottles of milk from the mammæ of the Virgin Mary, about one hundred of Christ's teeth, a piece of Christ's navel, half a dozen of his darbers, straw and hens from the barn (?) in which he was born, pieces of Noah's ark, a piece of Virgin Mary's nightdress, six big toes of St. Peter, and two skulls of Ignatius Loyola, one being of him when a child.

The last number of Fritänkaren contains a portrait and a sketch of George Brandes, the Danish litterateur of world-wide fame. Mr. Brandes, who was born Feb. 4, 1842, is a member of the International Freethought Association, and calls himself an Atheist. In 1867 he wrote his first work, "Dualism in Our Latest Philosophy." Since then he has published no less than twenty-three different works, all of which hav been translated into several foreign languages. In 1870 he passed the examination for the degree of Ph.D. The portrait of our late teacher is excellent.

The conservativ-clerical party is holding the reins in Belgium, and while all the other parties are busy revising the constitution, it is playing havoc with the public schools. There are at present over five hundred counties having no public school within their borders, yet the clerical party is not satisfied. The minister of public education has issued a permit allowing schools to be closed whenever it is deemed desirable to effect a saving in the expenses of a county, and a law guaranteeing a salary of one thousand francs to all teachers has been annulled. Such is the outcome of union between church and state, and it behooves American Freethinkers to organize and counteract any tendency to such union in this country.

In a late number of Fritänkaren we found a short contributed article which contained extracts of letters written by the great Swedish-American shipbuilder, John Ericsson, of Monitor fame. These extracts prove conclusivly that John Ericsson was if not a Freethinker then a Buddhist. In a letter to Cornelius H. Delameter he writes: "My dear Harry: Life is the greatest evil—annihilation the greatest blessing. To destroy individual existence, to finish the cycle of soul transmigration, to be liberated from the chain of life, is the goal for the Buddhist, and even, my dear Harry, for your devoted John Ericsson." John Ericsson's friends knew he was not a Christian, yet they allowed Christian ministers to insult his remains. Let us while alive leave such directions as will insure us an honorable departure.

Lectures and Meetings.

John R. Charlesworth's present lecture appointments are as follows: January 10th, Columbus, O.; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening at 8 o'clock in German Masonic Hall, No. 220 East 15th street, New York: January 1st—The Republic's Downfall through National Bankruptcy of Gouldism (shown on blackboard), George Francis Train; January 8th—Vegetable Food as a Means to Higher Development, Mrs. C. Le Favre; January 15th—The Study of Applied Sociology, Dr. R. G. Eccles; January 22d—Theosophy, W. Q. Judge; January 29th—Thomas Paine (anniversary address), Moncure D. Conway.

Made Them Feel Good.

When Prince George of Wales took command of the gunboat Thrush he also took upon himself the usual duty of conducting the religious service on the vessel on Sunday mornings. Everything went on well, apparently, but at the end of about four weeks some one suggested to the prince that he was not reciting the liturgy according to Cranmer, although the ship's company was highly flattered by his rendering. He had been reciting fervently and humbly, "We hav done those things that we ought to hav done, and hav left undone those things that we ought not to hav done," and the crew had been accepting his statement of the case and feeling good.

Was Christ Crucified?

BY A MEMBER OF THE CHICAGO BAR.

The believer who takes the New Testament for inspired, or the declarations of the Church for infallible, will, of course, not doubt Christ's crucifixion. Both the Scriptures and tradition clearly teach that Jesus was crucified. Those, however, who critically examine the evidence, without a belief in the supernatural, and take the scriptural and ecclesiastical accounts with no more credence than other ancient accounts similarly verified, must, if they critically examine the subject, raise the question whether there is adequate evidence of the crucifixion. The unbeliever who rejects the miracles must reject much else that is in the Bible, because it is inseparably connected with the miraculous. The same evidence is relied on to establish both, and if it is false as to the miracles it may be false as to the natural events. The latter are often related simply as parts of miracles—their circumstantial details—and, if the essential story is false, the details may be false, even if natural. I shall, accordingly, in this paper, examine the question whether there is adequate evidence of the crucifixion of Jesus.

This question is to be solved, as already intimated, by an examination of the evidences that lie outside of the Scriptures, and by using the Scriptures simply as ancient documents entitled to such credit only as other documents similarly circumstanced are entitled to. The question, accordingly, is, Have we sufficient evidence, without calling on our faith, to establish the crucifixion of Christ?

The chief difficulties in the way of accepting the common belief that Jesus was crucified are, that the Jews could not have crucified him, and that the Romans would not have crucified him for the offense charged. The Jews were a subject people who did not administer the laws in their own country, and were especially deprived of jurisdiction over capital offenses. A conquering people rarely allows another to exercise the power of life and death. The Jews, accordingly, could not have crucified Christ unless it was illegal (as the act of a mob), which, according to all accounts, it was not.

Nor would the Romans have crucified Christ for the offense charged. The infliction of capital punishment was regulated by law, and heresy to a foreign religion, which the Romans themselves did not accept, was not a capital offense. It is difficult to believe that any people would have executed one for an offense against a religion which they believed to be false.

The circumstances of the crucifixion, also, as related in the Gospels, were not in accordance with the customs of either the Jews or the Romans, but in several essentials were in direct violation of their laws; so that, whether a crucifixion occurred or not, it could hardly have occurred in the way related.

These are the difficulties stated in a general way. Before considering them, however, let us inquire what affirmative evidence we have of the crucifixion of Christ, and whether it is sufficient to overcome such improbabilities.

There is no contemporaneous evidence of the crucifixion at all, at least, none outside of the New Testament. No writer who lived at the time or in the country of Christ makes any mention of him, much less of his death. Not a word written near his time has come down to us that even touches on the subject. The Gospels themselves, according to the most critical estimates of the unbelievers, were not written till one hundred and fifty years after Christ; at least, there is no evidence that they existed before that time. The story that they were written by his disciples Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, is generally discredited. The common opinion of unbelief is that they date between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and eighty years after Christ, and that they were then composed by collecting floating reports and working up a few fragments now lost. The vast number of miracles and other stories in these Gospels, which are incredible to unbelievers, also tends to make them nearly worthless as evidence. Books which tell so many falsehoods about the supernatural are not reliable when speaking of the natural; but an untruthful person will be untruthful about a natural thing as well as about a supernatural one.

Several of Paul's epistles are perhaps of earlier origin than the Gospels. They certainly are if the Gospels were written as late as A.D. 150. These epistles speak of Christ as having been crucified, and they are the only evidence which dates near the alleged event. Paul, however, was not a contemporary of Jesus—at least, so far as we can judge from authentic history. He did not attach himself to the followers of Christ till after the death of Christ. How long after this he wrote we cannot say. His letters in which he refers to the crucifixion may have been written in his old age, when he was removed a whole generation from Jesus, and when legends of Christ's death had begun to spring up from unreliable sources. The same is true of the epistles ascribed to several other Apostles, which are generally acknowledged to have been written, if not by the persons to whom they are ascribed, at least near their time.

It must, however, be said of the credibility of the epistles of Paul and of the other Apostles, that in the same writings in which they speak of the crucifixion of Jesus they speak of his miracles and of other matters which are universally rejected by unbelievers; so that nothing more can be inferred from them than that the crucifixion was then a tradition, or beginning to become one. There were reasons, of which we shall presently speak, why such a death should be ascribed to Jesus even if false, and why the report of it should rapidly spread. Among such an illiterate people, and in a country with limited means of inter-communication, strange stories arise easily, spread rapidly, and are never disproven.

Outside of the New Testament there are no writings composed anywhere near the time of Christ that refer to him at all; so that all that we know of Jesus or his death at the beginning of the second century, is what we gather from the few letters mentioned. We depend wholly on the New Testament for a knowledge of Christ and of Christianity for a hundred years after Christ. Not a word from any writer known to be written in the same century in which he lived refers to him. No Roman, Greek, or Jewish author mentions him. His history is in complete isolation and obscurity, except for the few gleams of light that come from the letters mentioned. Never was a man so shut off from the world which he has influenced.

Josephus, indeed, makes two references to Jesus, if we take the passages as genuine; but most writers, Christian and unbelieving, now repel those passages as spurious. The first Christian writer who mentions Christ is Clement of Rome, but none of his writings are known to be of earlier origin than one hundred years after Christ, and some historians place them as late as one hundred and fifty years after Christ. The next who mentions him is Ignatius, whose epistles were written between 107 and 116 A.D. Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas, and the unknown author of the Epistles to Diognetus may have written their extant relics anywhere between one hundred and one hundred and fifty years after Christ. Besides these there is no Christian or other writing referring to Jesus that dates earlier than the middle of the second century, except a few fragments of Quadrato and Aristo written somewhere between 117 and 138 A.D.

It will thus be seen that we have not a scrap of literature about Christ or Christianity outside of the Bible that dates earlier than one hundred years after Christ.

We are shut up wholly to the New Testament and to a small part of that—several epistles—and what we cannot prove from that source we cannot prove at all. Pliny and Tacitus, indeed, have several short passages referring to Jesus, but their date is uncertain. Both of these men died about one hundred and fifteen years after Christ. Suetonius, who mentions the Christians, wrote still later. The first century of Christianity is a blank in history. We know nothing that occurred in it except through writings produced long subsequent to that time. We are two generations removed from Christ before a single word appears about him outside of the books of the New Testament. All this passed over to us across two generations came by legend or unverifiable tradition, and everybody knows how unreliable this is. The stories that should now come to us from such a distant time, handed down through so many mouths, from a country remote from civilization and among a people steeped in ignorance, would gain little credence; so that the weight of the evidence of tradition to the crucifixion is practically nothing. Few critical historians, even among Christians, give tradition any credit on a disputed point. The capacity of men for lying, and their incapacity to hand down correctly what they attempt to hand down truthfully, are too well known.

Such being the difficulties in the way of proving that Christ was crucified, and such being the materials from which we must prove it, if at all, let us betake ourselves to the task of determining whether it is certain, or even probable, that he was crucified.

As we are shut up to the New Testament accounts, in the inquiry, we have chiefly to determine whether from the details of those accounts the alleged transaction is in accordance with the laws and customs of the people who are alleged to have crucified him, and with other facts that are known to us in history.

And first as to the condemnation of Jesus by the Jews. We have said that the Jews had no power to condemn to death at the time of the alleged crucifixion. The Talmud says: "Forty years before the destruction of the temple the judgment of capital causes was taken away from Israel." Only the Roman authorities could exercise jurisdiction in capital cases. And yet according to the Gospel accounts, the Jews tried, convicted, and sentenced Jesus in their own court, and they did this without consultation with, or authority from, the Romans. It was not until after they had adjudged him worthy of death that they brought him to Pilate, or in any way sought a ratification of their action. According to the Gospels the Jews took the initiative, as if the Sanhedrim had original jurisdiction in such matters.

But whether or not the Jews had power to try Jesus for a capital offense, the trial was not according to Jewish law, and Jewish writers generally insist that it could not have taken place as related.

In the first place the preliminary examination of Jesus before trial by Annas or Caiaphas was illegal, it being the right of the accused to be free from any personal investigation whatever until brought for trial before his congregated brethren (Salvador's Institutions 1,366). The Jewish law instead of providing for a preliminary examination as some modern states do, expressly prohibited it. And yet we are informed in the Gospel of John that Christ was taken before the High Priest who asked him "of his disciples and of his teachings." The other Gospels also mention a preliminary examination.

As there is an apparent conflict between the Gospels as to this preliminary trial, it has been maintained that the preliminary hearing was the only trial had, and that it was at this trial that Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrim. But, besides the fact that this is in direct conflict with the account of John which represents Jesus as being sent to Annas and by him examined and then subsequently sent to Caiaphas and tried by the Sanhedrim, there is a greater difficulty, inasmuch as the whole trial would, on that supposition, be contrary to Jewish law and Jewish custom.

For in the next place the trial could not, according to Jewish law, have taken place at night, as related by Matthew and Mark. Capital trials, says the Mishna (De Synedrüs iv, 1), are commenced only in the daytime, and must also be concluded only in the day. They may be concluded on the same day if there is a sentence of acquittal, but must be postponed to a second day if there is to be a condemnation. Here, however, the trial appears, according to two gospels, not only to have been held at night, but to have been commenced and ended on the same day (or night rather), without any intermission, both of which were illegal. The following is the regulation contained in the Mishna: "If a man is found innocent the court absolves him; but if not, his judgment is put off to the following day. Meantime the judges meet together, and, eating little meat and drinking no wine during the whole day, they confer upon the cause. On the following morning they return into court," and vote over again (Mishna, De Synedrüs v, 5, and vi, 1).

It was also provided that capital trials should not be held on the day before a Sabbath or a fast day (De Synedrüs iv, 1). The meeting of the council, however, at which Christ was finally condemned, took place on Friday morning, a day before the Sabbath (being the same day on which Christ was crucified). Or if it met, according to some, on the previous day it was continued into Friday. If the trial was on Thursday it was illegal because it was held at night, if on Friday it was held on a day before the Sabbath. It could not, accordingly, have taken place on either day. According to the Gospel accounts Jesus was arrested, tried, condemned, and executed before two days had expired, all of which was illegal, and, according to Jewish writers, could never have occurred; and the question already arises, whether when a transaction is related which in so many essentials is improbable, there is any truth in it at all. For while some may say that the Jews simply acted illegally, there is a legal presumption, which we shall presently consider, that it is less probable that the great Sanhedrim, which was composed of seventy-one members, would wholly disregard its own laws and precedents, than that this story is a fiction invented in after times like the miracles.

There are other legal difficulties in the way of accepting the story of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus.

One is, that Jesus was questioned in his own case, which was not permitted in Jewish law. For the Jews could not even plead guilty. "Our law," says Maimonides, "condemns no one to death upon his own confession." Nor could the judges make any judicial use whatever of his testimony. "It is a fundamental principle with us," says Barte-more, "that no one can damage himself by what he says in judgment." And yet Matthew represents the High Priest as not only questioning Jesus, but persisting in his efforts to get him to testify: "Answerest thou nothing?" he says, "What is it which these witness against thee?" and the evangelist says that when Jesus held his peace "the High Priest said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the son of the living God," and that when Jesus answered that he was, the High Priest said, "He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy."

It is also related in the gospels that those who constituted the court—"the chief priests and the whole council"—went out of their way to find witnesses against Jesus, and false witnesses at that. That is, the judges made themselves the prosecutors of the accused, and worked up the case against him. They are represented as having determined on the death of Jesus in advance, and then manufactured evidence to accomplish it, thus not only deciding the case before the trial began, but suborning witnesses for the purpose of giving it an appearance of legality. Such proceedings on the part of judges are unprecedented, and especially on the part of such a large body of them. A lawyer could hardly believe the assertion. And yet Matthew says: "Now the chief priests and the whole council sought false witness against Jesus that they might put him to death." This is all the more strange since in the administration of the Jewish law the judges were understood to have somewhat the character of the advocates of the prisoner, like our judges-advocate at a court-martial, and to be charged with preventing any undue influence from prevailing against him. Even if the judges were corrupt enough to do what is here charged, it is hardly credible that they would have deemed it safe to do so, and especially that so many would do so—the whole Sanhedrim.

Colonel Ingersoll On the Tariff.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your last number you gave an extract from the views of Colonel Ingersoll on the tariff and silver. He says that it is better to pay $30 for American rails and keep the money at home than $25 for English rails and send the money abroad. But his statement is very far from covering the whole case. His view is that of the English in England in the last century, who reasoned about the management of the colonies as if England were an individual and the colonies a farm. If a Western farmer has to pay rates on a railroad that costs twenty per cent more what benefit is it to him whether the owner of the railroad livs in New England or in England? Furthermore, there cannot be a railroad built in America without selling the bonds in England; so the colonel's statement lacks completeness. The Republican party demonetizes silver, and being no longer money it is shipped as a commodity to England for sale. The railroad that carries it is owned in England, because having demonetized silver we are short of money and hav to borrow in England to build. The money value of silver falls one-third by reason of its demonetization, and England gets the benefit. But here comes in another factor. Pig iron can be made for $1.50 per ton in Alabama and Tennessee. It can be made cheaper there than elsewhere in the world. The Southern producers do not ask for a protectiv tariff. They can keep out all English rails by underselling the English. And silver will pay for anything or any labor that is necessary in building a railroad. But here is yet another factor. The demonetization of silver lowered the price of bullion so that India would not part with her silver coin at such prices in payment of her debt to England, but ships wheat instead. This is what ruined our Western farmers and created the Farmers' Alliance, for they could not compete with the coolie labor of India in wheat-raising. Now, here is what happens when things are as the colonel and the Republican party want them. The railroad sells its bonds in England, and they are not only a mortgage on the railroad but on the property of the farmers who use the road. Twenty per cent more is paid for the road by reason of the "protectiv" tariff. The silver that would otherwise be worth thirty per cent more is sold to England as a commodity. If it were used as money it would pay the miners better, and would pay more of them, and they would buy more farm produce. And the rails would be bought in Alabama, not in England, and the poor African in the iron-works get what the Republican party has never yet given him—solid benefit. So here is what we would hav: more railroads, and hence lower rates; more work for the miners of the Rocky mountains, and higher wages; more work for the iron-workers in the South; more mouths at home to consume the bread raised by the Western farmer, and greater ability to pay a living price for it; no India wheat coming to England to compete with ours, and hence a greater demand in England for both our wheat and our silver. Why cannot this be done? For two reasons—Pennsylvania cannot make iron as cheaply as the South can; her nabobs will not consent to liv less grandly than they do, nor can they afford to furnish "fat" to carry elections out of fair competitiv earnings. The national bankers want silver demonetized so that they can use their bank bills in its place, and they depend on the Republican party to keep them going. The people hav been kept paying interest on a public debt longer than necessary, merely to keep the bonds as a basis for their circulating notes. That part is a square contest as to whether the money shall be made by the pick of the laborer or the pen of the rich banker. I am in favor of protecting the miner in his ancient right; Colonell Ingersoll favors the bald-headed bank president in his barefaced and bald usurpation.

We are constantly told by Colonel Ingersoll's party that the bullion in a silver dollar is not worth a hundred cents. It is, however. Nobody on earth will sell a silver dollar for less. But the bullion that is not in silver dollars is not worth as much. Hence we ought to restore the constitutional coinage of silver, and all the silver bullion in the world would at once rise in price to an equality with what is now in silver dollars. And the countries that produce the silver would gain that and England would hav to pay us the rise in silver and the rise in wheat, which would be in the same ratio if the other circumstances remained the same. Is it not strange that there are Americans who willingly see their own country and people fleeced by the English? Why do they do it? Solely because they get part of the proceeds of the fleecing. Religion used to be "the chief concern of mortals here below," as the hymn informed us. Now money-making has taken its place. At that time it was too grave and weighty a matter to allow an individual to settle for himself, so the government settled it for him, and if an individual did not think on the subject as the government directed he was treated as a criminal. Now, since trade is the greatest object in life, there seems to be a fear in the minds of some that the individual will not do just as well as he might, so the government only allows him to buy where the dominant party thinks he will do the best. It is a curious coincidence that Colonel Ingersoll's Puritan ancestors were among the enforcers of religious restrictions, and he of trade restrictions. I am not in favor of trading on the same terms with all nations. For instance, England thinks we ought not to discriminate against her manufactured goods, but she discriminates against our silver. Her act of hostility ought to be answered by our hostil tariff against all English goods. France and the Latin Union are willing to use our silver as money if we will set the example. So I should say, let us trade free with them except a revenue tariff. There are other reasons why we should be hostil to England. Canada is a club in the hands of England to be used on the first occasion to break our head. Common sense would tell us that we must never allow Canada to be benefited by trade with us. A prudent regard for our national safety demands that we keep Canada from growing in strength, wealth, and population as much as we can. Unless the whole continent of North America shall come under one union of states it will certainly repeat the present unhappy experience of Europe, and the business of life in each one of the North American countries will be fighting or being always ready to fight. There are objections to the unification of America, but the objections to remaining apart politically are greater. Reciprocity with Canada will retard union with Canada; reciprocity with Mexico would hasten union with her, and the same is true of Cuba. So I feel that a general rule of trading alike with friends and enemies, as the Democrats propose, is little, if any, better than the present arrangement. I wrote a pamphlet to this effect about five years ago, and a digest of it was published in a magazine in 1888. What a queer set men are after all! They all talk about liberty, and they all want to restrict some other man's liberty in some respect. Colonel Ingersoll fought for free labor, but now he thinks it ought not to be free, for labor is not free unless exchange is free. Women ought to be free to marry, but when once married they ought not to be free to get a divorce, no matter how ill suited with the husband and he with her. People ought not to be free to use any and all the gold and silver they can get as money. No, they are like children with candy—they would never know when they got enough. They might get too much. We must hav a free press, we say. But Mr. Comstock is to define its freedom, and if he thinks we are likely to hurt ourselvs he will make it a little less free. What a commentary on freedom that so many old free-soilers and their newspapers can find no more bitter reproach to hurl at their enemies than "free trader." What a sermon in the fact that Germany and Sweden waged long and bloody wars for religious freedom and then at this late day put Dr. Voelkel and Victor Lennstrand in prison for being free-religious and free-thinking. So it goes. Everybody loves freedom and everybody is afraid that some one else will get too much of it and it will make him sick. I hav listened to the genial colonel's lecture on the "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," and when I come across his pleas for their restriction in the matters of exchanging the products of their labor and of coining the silver that they dig out of the ground I hav to laugh in my sleeve. And I confess to a little feeling of revenge in it, for on one side I descend from over two centuries of slaveholding ancestors, who hav been reviled for being slaveholders till they must writhe in their graves, yet they did a rather good part by their dusky chattels, and now comes one of their chief revilers who advocates what Herbert Spencer says is only a modified form of slavery. Truly all things come to him who waits.

We are told that one of the reasons for a protectiv tariff is to keep up the wages of labor in this country above those of the pauper labor of Europe. But is it not showing a great deal of faith in humanity for the government to leave the division of the tariff benefits entirely with the capitalist? The laborers hav repeatedly demanded that there be a sliding scale, and when iron sells for a certain price wages shall be a given figure, and when iron rises wages shall rise correspondingly. But so far from granting it the capitalist calls them "Communists" for asking it. As long as we hav a tariff for protection I want to see every protected industry made to giv reports to the federal government like national banks, and be allowed, first, to set aside six per cent dividends over and above all expenses, including the wages now paid; second, a division between the capitalist and the laborers, per capita, of all the profit above that. In other words, the advantage to the business that comes from the shutting out of competition shall be equalized among those whose votes accomplish it. But that is not all. To be just, the federal government must also set a limit to the price that the mills may sell their product for in this country. This would rob the tariff of its sting, it would equalize its benefits among the three classes concerned—the mill-owners, their laborers, and the consuming public. This would put an end to trusts.

Lexington, Mo. GEORGE WILSON.

My Lecture Trip.

Leaving Eagle, Neb., I took the night train immediately after my lecture on Saturday night for Nebraska City, en route for Hamburg, Ia., where I was engaged for two lectures on the Sunday. I had got somewhat chilly and cold while waiting for the train, which enabled me to fully appreciate the snug warm coaches; indeed, they were too comfortable. I had not been long in the cars before Somnus asserted his despotic sway, and I fell fast asleep. On went the train, while I slept entirely oblivious of my surroundings, when suddenly I awoke with a start, only to learn that I had ridden a distance of sixty miles south of my destination. I made all manner of inquiries how to get back to Hamburg in time, and was coldly informed that I should hav to go to Atchison, Kan., to catch a return train to Hamburg next morning. There was no help for it; so to Atchison I went, and did not reach Hamburg until 4 o'clock next day, just one hour too late for my lecture, consequently the two lectures were given on Sunday and Monday evenings respectivly.

I was met at the depot by Franklin Steiner, late of Des Moines, and never did I meet with a greater surprise in my life. I had expected to meet a man well advanced in years, and you can no doubt imagin my surprise to meet with a young man not yet out of his teens. His writings and his work in behalf of Freethought hav already earned him the confidence and good feeling of all Freethinkers in this part of the country, and I can safely predict a good future for him. He is a close and earnest student, and bids fair to become one of the foremost Freethought advocates in the United States. My first lecture in Hamburg was given to a crowded house, the audience according me a hearty welcome. My second lecture also met with a good reception, and favorably impressed me with the earnestness of the Freethinkers of Hamburg. This town has a population of two thousand five hundred, and has an enormously large Liberal element in proportion thereto, so much so that the churches hav to strain every point to keep open their doors. Hamburg bids fair to become one of the most activ centers for Freethought work in this district, thanks to the generosity of F. W. Toedt, one of its most prominent citizens, and who has kindly erected a Freethought hall in the center of the town, and which is to be dedicated to Freethought propaganda. Its erection is a sore blow to the churches, for in it they can realize another thorn in their crown. They can begin now to understand that Freethought is not a mere passing fancy, but a tree full of life and vigor, a tree whose branches shall spread over all lands, and shall awaken in every heart the pulse-beat of liberty. It is a handsome structure, and one that the whole city needs to be proud of. It will be known as the Lyceum. Already its name stands in large letters on the front part of the building. I can only express a fervent hope that each town and city in every state may soon be able to follow the noble example set by this generous and worthy Freethinker, F. W. Toedt. I succeeded in getting another resolution passed by the audience relating to the World's Fair and its closing on Sunday, the same to be forwarded to all interested parties in connection therewith. While here I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Golden, and though I may never be able to return them sufficiently for their kindness to me, I can at least acknowledge a heartfelt gratitude. I staid here about twelv days, and gave them four lectures in all. I was accompanied on the platform each time by Franklin Steiner, who made a short answer upon one occasion to a circular that had been issued by the religious element of the town. Mr. Steiner has made known his intentions to organize a state Secular Union in Iowa in the immediate future, and as there now seems to be a general desire among Freethinkers for a state Union, it is to be hoped that he will be able to get the support and sympathy of the Freethinkers of Iowa. I was very glad to meet with such earnest and Liberal workers as Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Toedt, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Golden, D. R. Thompson, Gus. Wagner, Dr. Clarke, and several others.

From Hamburg I went to Ottumwa, where I gave two more lectures the week following. I arrived here on Thursday night, late, and was taken to the Ballingall Hotel, where I met J. W. Dayton, an activ, intelligent, and earnest Freethought worker, educated for a Presbyterian minister. He saw the hollowness and hypocrisy of the professors, and understood the untenableness of the doctrins and dogmas, so he became a Freethinker instead. His devoted wife is one of those few women who hav advanced so far as to appreciate and encourage Freethought propaganda, and detests the creeds of the Christian church with the intensity of her passionate and devoted nature. They are a young couple, and judging from the activ interest they take in our work, I shall expect great things from them in Ottumwa. Mr. Eaton is a clever, young, activ, and zealous worker for human freedom. Imbued with a tender and sympathetic nature, he revolted against the cruel creed of Christendom at an early age, and has now become one of the most advanced Freethinkers in Ottumwa. This city has now splendid material by which valuable work can be accomplished, and it is to be hoped that good use will be made of them. Ottumwa is a large and prosperous town of sixteen thousand inhabitants. It has quite a large number of Freethinkers, among whom are some of its most respected and valued citizens. Comprising as they do a large representation of the business portion of the community, it may be seen at a glance what a power they might become if only their opportunities were well utilized. Ottumwa is beyond doubt the ideal Freethought town of Iowa. I gave two lectures, on Sunday and Tuesday evenings respectivly. My first lecture here met with the greatest success of my trip; over two hundred people were turned away for want of room. When I first entered the hall there was scarcely standing-room to be found. Next morning the local press gave out a complimentary notice of the lecture. I gave the next lecture in a larger hall. While here I was the guest of J. W. Dayton at the Ballingall Hotel. It is Mr. Dayton's intention to establish (if possible) a lecture bureau for the state of Iowa, an undertaking with which I heartily concur. I am sure that no one could be better qualified than Mr. Dayton to establish such an institution; his practical knowledge of railway routes and his extensiv acquaintance among Freethinkers in the various towns of the state can be made of great value to Freethought lecturers. In fact, I am of the opinion that such a lecture bureau in each state would not only simplify matters for the Liberal lecturers, but would also be of greater benefit to them, because it would open out possibilities such as never before existed.

While here I was approached by a leader of the Salvation Army, who pressed me to purchase a War Cry from him. Immediately the thought flashed through my mind to make an exchange with him, if possible; whereupon the following conversation took place:

Salvation Chap: "Would you purchase a War Cry, please?"

J. R. C.: "Yes, if in return you will purchase something from me."

S. C.: "Well, that all depends on what it is; may I ask what it is you desire me to purchase?"

J. R. C.: "Yes; it is Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason?'"

S. C.: "What is the cost of the book? I never heard of it before."

J. R. C.: "You say you never heard of the book before. Do you read anything at all?"

S. C.: "Oh, yes! We hav to read, you know."

J. R. C.: "But then if you hav never heard of this book before I am afraid that your studies hav been very limited. I am surprised that a gentleman of your profession should never hav heard mention of this work."

S. C.: "Well, you see, we only get an opportunity to read after meetings."

J. R. C.: "But you giv the whole of your time to this work, do you not?"

S. C.: "Yes, but we are visiting during the daytime, and the evenings are the only opportunity we get to read at all."

J. R. C.: "Well, did you ever hear of Thomas Paine?"

S. C.: "No."

J. R. C.: "What, never heard talk of Paine the great Infidel?"

S. C.: "No sir, I cannot say that I hav."

J. R. C.: "Well, my friend, if you purchase Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason' from me, the cost of which is only twenty-five cents, I will purchase from you fifty cents' worth of your War Cry's."

S. C.: "I accept your offer."

J. R. C.: "Now, should I sell you this book will you giv me your word of honor as a man that you will read it, and not destroy it?"

S. C.: "I promis to do as you wish."

Whereupon the exchange was made, the Salvation Chap taking the "Age of Reason," and John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," which I presented to him; he then gave to me ten copies of the War Cry. When he had taken them he turned as if to go, but immediately demanded to know what I was going to do with his papers, to which I answered, distribute them of course, which I did.

My lectures in Ottumwa gave general satisfaction all round. I was informed that it was not my own personality that was speaking when on the platform, but the spirit of Thomas Paine who was talking to the audience through me. Of course I felt somewhat flattered; but I could not help thinking how foolish the local press must hav been in attributing the address to myself; but then, perhaps they were not aware of the actual state of affairs. I was very pleased indeed to meet with such an earnest Freethinker as Miss Pepper, an earnest and intelligent young lady and one devoted to the advancement of Freethought. I wish with all my heart that our cause had more like her—also Mr. and Mrs. McCarrol; Mr. and Mrs. Millersack; J. W. Lindsay; Joseph Wagg; Mr. Bolten; also Dr. Davis the chairman of my first lecture, and Mr. McConnel, the chairman of my second lecture, and who is also the editor of the Ottumwa Democrat. The above, assisted by J. W. Dayton and wife, A. L. Eaton and wife, constitute the advanced guard of Freethought in this town. I left here for Chicago on Wednesday morning, where I shall accept the invitation of our old friends E. A. Stevens and family and spend a few days with them at their home. I hav a few dates open to lecture in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, for week-nights only, and friends wishing me to lecture may still address in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 W. Madison st., Chicago.

Blasphemous Jokes.

EXPECTED THE SAME OLD THING.

"Do you want to come in?" asked St. Peter kindly, as a forlorn-looking soul rode up on a second-hand cloud.

"I dunno," was the dubious response. "Ain't the poor pew kinder drafty?"

"No, no; we hav no poor pew here!" Taking hold of his arm—"Come right in!"

"No, ye don't! I know what religion is, an' I know what heaven is. No poor pew, no religion; no religion, no heaven. So long!"

BAD CASE OF INSOMNIA.

Because there is another chap
That I catch smiling at my girl
When I, perchance, drop in a nap.

News and Notes.

A reception was given to the Secular Pilgrim at the residence of Charles Haas, Stockton, Cal., on Friday evening, December 11th. About forty ladies and gentlemen were present. W. F. Freeman presided at the table, and when the company were seated said:

"Giving thanks before meals is not yet an obsolete custom. Personally, I believe in it, and if by a miracle this elegant and sumptuous repast was provided then I should deem it appropriate to thank God for it. But as the eatables and decorations were provided by the ladies and the wine presented by A. Schell, I shall, on behalf of those present, reverently and affectionately thank them for it."

After responding to a toast of generous welcome, the following were given and responded to by other guests present:

"Freethought national, its growth and influence"—H. B. Loomis.

"Freethought local, a retrospect of its history"—Dr. A. T. Hudson, first president of the Pioneer Liberal Society of Stockton.

"Germany, its people and its literature, true to the principles of Freethought"—Dr. A. S. Hudson.

"Organization and methods of presenting our opinions to the public"—Victor Heck.

"The Liberal press and literature"—Putnam.

"The society of Turn-Verein, although an offspring of a government of kings, is an exemplar of civil, political, and religious liberty in its broadest sense, ever ready to cooperate for their promotion or defense"—Charles Wagner.

The occasion was a delightful one, to be remembered for its bright companionship along the pathway of reform.

On Saturday evening I went to Lodi. Here my friend, George Hogan, had arranged for a lecture, and a larger number were present than I expected. The orthodox somewhat prevailed here. The Liberals, however, though few, are ready to do their level best. I shall try it again.

On Sunday evening at Stockton I address the largest audience I hav yet met in the state. The New Pioneer Hall was crowded to its utmost extent. I had appreciativ listeners. My subject was "Freethought and Morality," and I took occasion to reply to strictures made upon Freethinkers by the clergymen of the place. I gave the statistics of crime, which are not very favorable to orthodox virtue. I did not read "The Crimes of Preachers," for that would take too long.

I cannot but feel jubilant at the prospect of the work so far in California and the splendid results achieved by Stockton Liberals. At the first Freethought lecture given here years ago, only fifteen were present. Now one of the largest halls in the city is packed.

I must thank the members of the Turn-Verein Singer's Club for the beautiful music with which they aided the opening exercises of this Liberal meeting. Professor Wirth, the Simons Brothers, Messrs. Snyder, Diel, Didrick, Lambert, were our generous and melodious allies on this occasion, and their splendid songs were greeted with rounds of applause.

I leave Stockton on Monday morning and make a short visit at Sacramento, with N. D. Goodell, O. T. Davis, and R. Butterfield, with others. The capital city of the state is one of the most difficult places for Freethought lectures. I guess there is too much "boodle" here as well as orthodoxy. The Bible is read in the schools by order of the board of education. Think of that for California. A chaplain is always appointed by the legislature at $5 a day. The clergymen lobby with a great deal of unction for this "soft" job. An enormous cathedral is erected, one of the most magnificent and expensiv in the world; and no doubt the politicians look upon it with awe. There are votes connected with its palatial splendor.

However, I am going to keep up the fight at Sacramento. It is too important a point to surrender to the enemy. The "old guard" will stand by the guns.

Tuesday I come up to Gridley in Butte county—about fifteen miles north of Marysville. It has about a thousand inhabitants, situated in the midst of a fine and productiv country. Almost all kinds of fruits are produced here, including oranges and lemons.

I giv the first Freethought lecture at Gridley. The effect is somewhat startling. The ideas are so new, so extraordinary, that the people, most of them, are really dumfounded. It seems to take their breath away. There was a fair audience at my first lecture on the "Demands of Liberalism." I asked for a debate at the close. One gentleman arose and inquired if I agreed with St. Paul on the Sunday question. I told him I most assuredly did. That seemed to satisfy him. I told him to come the next evening and listen to my lecture on "The Bible," and perhaps he would find that St. Paul and I were not harmonious on all points. He said he would come. I had a good attendance on the second evening. At the close of the lecture a clergyman came up and shook hands with me, but did not reply to my statements, or ask any questions. Evidently there was quite a commotion. One young man who had never heard the like before thought that I ought to be tarred and feathered. The clergyman's wife asserted that I had a very bad-looking head, worthy of the devil himself. I guess there never was such talk in Gridley before. It was as if a river had overflowed its banks, and the inhabitants were so amazed that they did not know what to do. I did not hav so many at my third lecture. The orthodox were shy. However, the opera house was well filled and my lecture cordially received. But I never did strike exactly such a place as Gridley. It has a peculiar make-up. The orthodox clergyman sent word to know if I was to be believed now, or when I was in the ministry. I told him now of course, for when I was in the ministry I was a fool—now I know a little something. I sent word that I hoped he would make the same advance, if not by "God's grace," at least by that of common sense. I am satisfied with what has been done. The stagnation is at an end. There will be movement now. If the orthodox are mad they will certainly do some thinking. The next best thing to convincing a Christian is to make him angry. That stirs his blood, sends it to his head, and the momentum of his brain is increased and a new thought is bound to flash and vibrate there. I am sure that the next time I come to Gridley I shall hav a warm reception. Of course the orthodox would like to make it so warm that I should be burnt up in the flames of hell.

Mr. L. P. Denney is the one who stood the brunt of the battle. I was called Denny's preacher, and it was a nine days' wonder as to what kind of man Denny's preacher was. Mr. Denny has been a Liberal for only a few years. He used to be a good Methodist. At fourteen years of age he entered the army and was in the war three years and a half. After the war he went to a Methodist school at Marengo, Ill., where he was so interested in religion that he conducted prayer-meetings and almost became a preacher. But he could not understand the "mystery of godliness," and so he decided to study mechanics and earn his living. He came to this country fifteen years ago and has won a high position in his business. He has aided in the geological reports of the state. He is well known for his mechanical skill. When any difficult undertaking is on hand he is called upon. A few years ago he came across a few torn leaves of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL at a hotel where he was staying. This was the first light toward the Freethought path, but he stuck to it, and is a stalwart Liberal now, and I had a delightful time at his hospitable home. Mrs. Denney, although still on the rolls of the church, is an intelligent and cultivated Liberal lady, not quite so radical and enthusiastic, however, as Mr. Denney.

C. D. Carus is a good right-hand man with Mr. Denney. He is the village blacksmith and he can make the sparks fly in almost every direction. He is not afraid to speak his honest thoughts.

Wednesday morning Mr. Carus drove me over to Biggsville, about three miles from Gridley, and about as large as Gridley. There are some Liberals in this place, but they were not ready for a lecture at this time. I passed through some excellent country, with orchards varying from twelv hundred to three thousand acres in extent. Vast wheat fields are also in the vicinity, and immense vineyards.

On Wednesday Mr. Denny drives me over to Oroville. This is one of the oldest mining towns in the state, and has an air of '49 about it in its stores and hotels. The first railroad in California was built from Marysville to Oroville. Marysville was the head of navigation, and Oroville the center of the mountain trade. Since the mining industry has decreased this country is becoming famous for its early oranges, and round about Oroville, on the high bluffs in the colonies of Themalito and Palermo, are some of the finest groves in the state. The bottom lands are held at $500 an acre. Along the streets of Oroville are trees laden with luscious fruit. This is what is called the "Thermal belt," and the first oranges of the season are produced here.

Near Oroville the Golden Feather River Co. has constructed its wonderful flume and mining works, which are a marvel of enterprise. The flume is miles in length, and with its machinery, wheels, Portland cement walls, etc., cost $1,000,000. The object is to lay bare the bed of the river, which is supposed to be thick with gold, as if a hundred argosies had been wrecked on the tumbling Feather river and deposited their riches on its sandy bottom. For ages the wealth of the mountains has been silently drifting hither. Now this enterprising company, with millions of English capital, proposes to reap the unknown harvest. Mr. Denney drove to where this vast flume takes the waters from the original channel and hurls them along the mountain side. It presents a grand spectacle.

Our day's trip from Gridley to Oroville and return was an entertaining one, with its variety of scenery—the foothills; Table mountain; Feather river; the broad plains; Marysville buttes; orchards; groves; Oroville, with its mining reminiscences, "Gem of the Foothills," as it is now called, and Gridley comfortable and prosperous where the sun sheds its most genial rays.

There has never been a Freethought lecture in Oroville. There are Freethinkers here among the leading citizens of the place, and I hope some time to make a campaign where the orange and the pomegranate grow and Feather river dashes its golden tide. Some day I shall come back to Gridley too. Denney has put his hand to the plow and he won't turn back. Only think, the church right alongside his Infidel mansion was burnt to the ground and not a particle of injury did he receive. House, barn, everything, untouched by the devouring flame. Truly a "divine providence."

Gridley, Dec. 18, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Quarterly Report of the Secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union.

Through the columns of your valuable paper I hope to reach all the members of the Oregon State Secular Union, and herewith, as secretary of the same, I submit my quarterly report of all money received and how disbursed. I also append the names of all those who so far hav contributed toward the $500 fund for the coming year. I hope all the Liberals in the state understand our obligations to Mrs. Krekel, and the reason we voted her added compensation. The office of field secretary was forced upon her after she had positivly declined twice to act in that capacity; so the Union could do no less honorably than to see that her expenses were paid. In order to do that we were forced to draw on the new $500 fund for the sum of $50 to furnish the payment of the $250 the convention voted should be paid her. The sum of $22.50 was contributed by friends, whose names are given below; the rest was drawn from the treasury. I hav written one hundred and seventy-three letters concerning the work for the coming year, and I wish to say here that I hope the Liberal friends will at least answer my letters and giv me what encouragement they can. I gladly giv my time to the work, but there must be coöperation among the members, and activ work especially among the vice-presidents, or our official work will be in vain. "One swallow does not make a summer," nor can three officers make a successful Union. We must hav hearty and willing assistance all along the line to accomplish any good. Remember, friends, our legislators are to be elected next June, and we must be prepared to stand by the fifth resolution of our last convention, namely, "That we, as members of the Oregon State Secular Union, will do all in our power to elect men to the legislature of Oregon in 1892 pledged to work for the repeal of all Sunday laws and for the enactment of laws making church property pay its just share of tax." In order to make that resolution mean anything we must begin work now in our several localities, and work with that resolution constantly in view.

At our last election of officers we elected no officer that was a resident of Portland, except C. A. Rohabacher, vice-president. Mr. Schroeder and I soon found we must hav more assistance in Portland to resist the encroachments of the church party led by the Catholic archbishop Gross.

So we appointed Mr. Henry Addis assistant secretary, Mrs. Sue R. Keenan vice-president for East Portland, and gave them official power to act in conjunction with Vice-president Rohabacher as a committee to collect funds, do any Liberal work to advance the good cause, and report progress to us. Mr. Addis has already done some excellent missionary work, distributing several hundred of C. B. Reynolds's pamphlets against Sunday law, a strong argument and a goodly array of facts which ought to be placed in the hands of every voter in the United States. I wish here to thank Brother Reynolds for his generosity in sending the pamphlets free. He is a grand worker in the Liberal cause, and is doing a splendid work in our sister state, Washington.

Let me again appeal to every Liberal in the state to come to our assistance as much as they can afford in the furtherance of the good work. Dear friends, let me hear from you as early as convenient so we will know what to plan for our next campaign.

Fallacy Swallowing.

From the St. Joseph Herald.

To show how some people write and others read and digest without thought, the article by the St. Louis Republic affords a fine example. It is entitled "The Rock of Moses," and has been republished in nearly all the newspapers of the Union and read with admiration by millions. It begins by asking how many know that the very rock struck by Moses when he commanded water for the famishing thousands in the wilderness is still to be seen, as natural as it was in the days of Moses. It quotes Dr. Thomas Shaw, D.D., regius professor of Greek, Oxford, England, one of the most learned of men and travelers. "It is a block of marble granit, six yards square." The waters which hav flowed out hav hollowed across one corner a channel about two inches deep, twenty inches wide. Besides, we see all over this channel a great number of holes, some of them four or five inches deep and two in diameter, living tokens of these having been so many fountains." Now just think of the size of the rock and channel and then think of the story as told. Six hundred and four thousand men armed and fit for war with all their women and children and many cattle came out of Egypt with Moses, about three million souls; all thirsty, too! All marched in three days some ninety miles, crossed the Red sea, went to Elam where were twelv wells and seventy-two palm trees, and rested, and were refreshed. Now just think of this three million people standing around a rock eighteen feet square to drink from a channel of the size described. Truly the miracle of the stricken rock and gushing waters was much; and the miracle of all these hosts of cattle and all this drinking was more, but greatest of all is that of so many millions of people reading such an article and swallowing it.

Protestants Hav Protested Themselvs Out of Christianity.

From the Catholic Review.

A recent Protestant paper uses this remarkable language: "It is impossible not to recognize that in the last fifty or sixty years something has happened. Stress is no longer laid upon the great distinctiv truths of orthodox religion. If a man works for the temperance cause, shows deep interest in the labor problem, is in sympathy with Christian Socialism, what matter is it whether he be a Jew or a Greek, a Unitarian or a Catholic? These are the sentiments that are molding us in spite of ourselvs." Could there be a more candid confession that, so far as the sects are concerned, the attempt to establish morality upon a supernatural Christian basis has proved a failure, and that "in spite of themselvs" they hav been forced by the world to go back to the inculcation merely of the natural morality of ancient paganism?

Letters of Friends.

We Shall Try to Keep It the Greatest Paper.

GOLDEN POND, KY., Dec. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find our check for $1. We want some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 12, 1891. We are subscribers to your paper and hav been a long time. We think it the greatest paper in the world. We hav never had the pleasure of hearing a lecture at all, hoping some time to hav means to go far to hear one. Yours truly,

BOGARD & RODES.

Thinks the Pen Won't be Too Hot.

INDUSTRIAL HOME, DELAW RE CO., O., Dec. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I will take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I liv and hav the means to pay for it, and hope when I leave this country I will be able to explain through the columns of it the place where I settle down and intend to stay the balance of my time, and wish to say to its many friends that I am not going to purchase a return ticket. Therefore let THE TRUTH SEEKER prosper. SOLOMON HILL.

SALINAS, CAL., Nov. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When the Bible Picture Book is issued without fail send me a copy. I hav the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and find it a stunner to religious bigots, liars, slanderers, cutthroats, and self-installed pulpiteers. I propose to stand by the cannon, and load her heavy; if the ball does not hit the concussion will shatter. The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in Benicia goes by the name of "Ostello's Bible." I want the other one for Ostello's cannon. I am pleased with you, gentlemen. Your work is my delight.

Sincerely yours to keep the eagle above the cross, J. H. OSTELLO.

Thanks from Ourselvs and the Rest of Mankind.

PAULINE, ARK., Dec. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Heston has done much good work in pictures, but I doubt if he has ever made a more striking one than in an October number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The agonized look and tearful face of woman looking back through the vista of ages to that implacable tyrant in the skies! —it is enough to shame, if not to damn, all the priests and clergy in the world, for propagating such a hellish doctrin. Oh, the suffering and martyrdom of the human race! I am working silently for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Every subscription to it in my county has been through my efforts. For no other Freethinker has ever in this part of the country publicly expressed his views, denouncing priestcraft and superstition, but myself, which I do both in lectures and at home.

DR. W. R. BACHELOR.

No Hereafter.

TROY, N. Y., Dec. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Send a copy of Bible Pictorial Book, also "Mortality of the Soul and Immortality of Its Elements," "Materialism and Crime," "The Religion of Inhumanity, With a Glance at the Religion of Humanity," for which I send $1.65. In the letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the death of D. M. Bennett the writer expresses my views on death. There can be no resurrection or spiritual life after death, because that life, or force, then ceases. The conditions must be placed before we can reason intelligently. The brain must be well developed, the head a certain size. The dynamic force that conveys the impressions of what we see or hear through the senses by the nerves to the brain is elaborated by the various organs from the food taken into the stomach; when they cease to perform their function, spirit and body die.

BELLVIEW, COL., Dec. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There are a few things that I want to know. 1. Where did God go when Moses left the children of Israel in the wilderness? 2. Why could not God save the world without sending Jesus Christ that through him it might be saved? 3. Why does the Bible say that a bastard cannot enter the kingdom of heaven and then say that Christ went there? The Bible must lie when it says one can not, or else it lies when it says that Christ went there. 4. Why did God say that the sun rises and sets each day and flees with great swiftness from where it goes down to where it rises, when he ought to hav known that it stands still? 5. Being an honest and upright God, why did he tell the children of Israel to steal the earrings, and breastpins, and finger-rings, and gold and silver before they started? 6. Why did he not take them to the promised land when he promised to do so, when he foreknew all things and knew that he could not do it? 7. I would like to get a lock of hair off that cloud that overshadowed Mary. I want it to poison rats.

Aaron made a golden calf, but nowadays there are lots of calves sucking the Bible that are not gold. But after all, the Bible makes a good bait when you are trapping for fools. JOSEPH P. TROYER.

Interesting Points in Morals.

SANTA ROSA, CAL., Dec. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As a believer in that cold, but clean and progressiv, religion known as Materialism, I find much in your paper that pleases me. I must quarrel with you, however, in regard to something I find in your issue of the 5th of December. It is to be found in your reply to the Rev. Mr. Peters, and is as follows: "And it is a fact that Scotland, the most pious of all, is the most immoral, producing more illegitimate children and consuming more whisky in proportion to the population than any other country."

If the practice of morality consists in living honorably and in conformity with the laws of nature, then I claim that Scotland will bear favorable comparison with any other country, not even excepting the United States. The offense of begetting illegitimate children may be said to be contrary to social law, but it cannot be said to be any breach of natural moral law. I admit that the young people of Scotland are too often led astray, by giving way to the bewitching voice of passion, instead of using that self-control that reason would suggest; but when they do discover the unfortunate result of their indiscretion, they generally allow nature to take its course, instead of resorting to any unnatural expedient for the destruction of the unborn. Prenatal infanticide is unknown in Scotland—how is it in France and America, and what can be greater immorality?

Again, the consumption of whisky is only immorality when taken to excess or when its consumption is attended with immoral or injurious consequences.

J. H. TAYLOR.

Serene Close of a Truth-Loving and Beneficent Life.

SHERIDAN, Dec. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send the following obituary: Departed from this life Dec. 2, 1891, Artemus Gleason, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. Mr. Gleason was born in the township of Durham, Green county, N. Y., Feb. 7, 1826. At the age of five years his parents moved to Ohio. In 1851 he was married to Amanda Brainard, and two years later moved to Michigan and settled on a homestead in the wilderness. He was one of the first pioneers of Montcalm county, and suffered many hardships and privations, but through industry and perseverance he acquired a comfortable property. Ten children were born to them, of whom seven are living.

Mr. Gleason was a man noted for his veracity and honest integrity of character. He was a ready sympathizer in time of trouble and often helped a poor man to his own pecuniary disadvantage. He did right from principle and not fear of punishment or for hope of reward in a future. He had been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for twelv or fourteen years and was a most ardent supporter and defender of its cause. He boldly proclaimed his principles, and died believing that in this life only had we any hope.

He never sought for any social honors or distinctions. He was always at home unless business or duty called him away. He was a kind husband, an indulgent father, a true and faithful ifrend.

Mr. M. V. Moulton, of Grand Rapids, delivered the funeral address. The deceased was borne to his last resting-place by his six sons.

May we not say with Ingersoll: "With morn, with noon, with night, with changing cloud and changeless star, with grass and trees and flowers, with bud and blossoming vine, with all the sweet influences of nature, we leave our dead." Husband, father, friend, farewell.

A. M. SANDERS.

"Innate Ideas."

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Dec. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having carefully read all under the above heading, December 5th, I fail to find a single gleam or ray of light. All is darkness profound. It may not inaptly be called a mass of profound speculation containing little, if any, actual knowledge, notwithstanding its being elicited from so many and such eminent and distinguished sources.

If anyone can tell what life is, when, where, and how it originated, that would be the first step in the solution and answer to the inquiry what thought is—when and how that originated. It is a demonstrated fact, proved by scientific research, that life is not spontaneous, but always preceded by former life. And it is also a fact, or truth, that there is no thought independent of life. Like the life germ, it had a preceding thought.

It is therefore beyond the reach of human intellect to answer logically a single question called out by that so-called investigation.

The principle or force existing throughout the universe, by some called deity, by theologians divine power or being, the uneducated, even the untutored savage "who sees God in clouds or hears him in the wind," knows just as much about as the theologian or philosopher.

And, further, the truths known, when compared with the unknown, are like a single gleam of light compared with the millions that flash from an unclouded noonday sun.

As well attempt to measure space, that has neither form nor outline; yet suns and worlds unnumbered hav a home there.

JOHN VAN DENBURGH.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., Dec. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: John R. Coats, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 5th, asks: "Where Was Christ Born?" Matthew says, in a house (see Matt. ii, 11); Luke says, in a stable (see Luke ii, 16). Now, was he born twice, or did God inspire one of the gentlemen to tell a lie? If so, which? And did Judas Iscariot die twice? Matthew says he hanged himself (see Matt. xxvii, 5); Peter says he burst asunder and his bowels gushed out (see Acts i, 16). Will our devout friends tell us which is true? We once asked a preacher these questions, and he was cute enough to answer thus: "Christ was born in a building used as a stable and house, so both Matthew and Luke were right. Judas Iscariot broke the rope when making the leap, and, falling headlong, 'burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out.'" Said he: "You see, my Infidel friend, that the blessed Bible never contradicts itself." We immediately fired this at him: "In Gen. ii, 17, God says to the woman: 'But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.' And, my Christian friend, you will observe without turning over the leaf in your blasted Bible that the devil says to the woman, 'Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.' And, my poor foolish, Christian imbecil, you hav only to turn the leaf over to find that God owned himself a liar, almost repeating the devil's words, thus: 'And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil.' And what's the matter with your old book when it says, 'No man hath seen God at any time. And he said, Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me and liv,' and jumps from that, saying, 'And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend?' My dear deluded sky-pilot, your old Bible is a network of lies from Genesis to Revelation, and there are not preachers enough in Iowa to defend the old rotten hulk against one man of common horse sense." We hav not heard from that preacher since, and, that the sky-pilots might hav a bone to pick at their leisure, we fired a similar dose at them through the columns of a Butler county paper, sending all within our reach a copy. We are not gifted with this world's goods, but we will giv $50 for a picnic from Genesis to Revelation with from ten to twenty thousand preachers.

Yours for all there is in it,

MEL PIERCE.

A Forcibly Written Letter on Money.

COOK, NEB., Dec. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of December 12th, under the head, "A Hard-Money Man Writes Ironically," permit me to say that A Hard-Money Man writes foolishly, when he says, "I can see no reason why the people should be taxed for the support of the government," etc. If Hard-Money Man will tell us what he means by government, "the gentleman of profound financial ability" will undoubtedly "solve" the "problem," but when Hard-Money Man goes to talking about the government collecting all the "old clothes from the country" and giving to every "man, woman, and child $50,000" he certainly has some being or beast in his mind that no other man has ever seen or thought of, and one too that would be wholly competent to lift itself by taking hold of the seat of its pants, and this thing (if his language has any meaning at all) is what he calls government. Had his mind not been weighed down by this fearful monstrosity he might hav derived some benefit from those "able letters" so that he would be able to see that hard money is a myth, a play upon words, and is only used by the ignorant or by those who hav played the part of the appropriators of wealth and who would continue by the same deception to filch year after year all that the toiling millions can compel stubborn nature to yield up to them. Now, Mr. Hard-Money Man, see if you can comprehend this idea: You go to your post-office for the purpose of buying fifty two-cent stamps. It will take one hundred cents to get them. You can get them with one hundred coppers, twenty nickels, ten pieces of silver, four pieces of silver, two pieces of silver, one piece of silver, one piece of gold, and one piece of paper, and each representing exactly the same number of units, one hundred cents, and each possessing precisely the same purchasing power. The postmaster is not the government, neither is he a part of the government only in the same sense that every other citizen is. But the post-office is part of the government. Now, the post-office (government) owes the citizen (postmaster) the units, one hundred cents. The government pays over to the citizen the one hundred cents received from you. The citizen (postmaster) goes to a jeweler and buys a gold pin for one hundred cents to present to his wife for a Christmas present, the purchasing power remaining the same though he uses either copper, nickel, silver, gold, or paper, and in neither transaction nor yet in hundreds of thousands to follow did or will the intrinsic value of the copper, nickel, silver, gold, or paper hav any power one over the others to that which is for sale, nor for any other purpose in which money has use. Neither is the man living that can tell the intrinsic value of either of the articles used to represent these units of one hundred cents. But, sir, when you bought your stamps you paid a dollar tax to the government, and it was a mighty good investment too—a great deal cheaper than you could hav delivered the fifty letters that the fifty stamps were put upon.

You see, sir, that your one hundred cents units (money) were simply a medium that enabled you to get the stamps and the postmaster to get the gold pin, and so ad infinitum, and the only power that government has in the matter is expressed by the Supreme Court's decision, wherein it says: "In the matter of law, the question whether, at any particular time in war, or peace, the exigency, if such, by reason of unusual or pressing demands on the resources of the government, or of the inadequacy of the supply of gold and silver coin to furnish the currency needed for the uses of the government and of the people, that it is, as a matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means, is a political question to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterward passed upon by the courts. It follows that the act of May 31, 1878, is constitutional and valid, and that the tender in treasury notes reissued and kept in circulation under that act was a tender of lawful money. . . . Congress by the Constitution, we are irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that the impressing upon treasury notes of the United States the quality of being a legal tender is an appropriate means, conduciv and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of Congress, consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and, therefore, within the meaning of that instrument, necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States." But, sir, there is no power by the government or by the Constitution to go out through the country and gather up rags and make them into notes and giv to every man and woman and child $50,000, and no man writes such stuff except for the purpose of deceiving and prejudicing the ignorant. We want postage stamps enough to put on our letters, and it would be an act of injustice to hav postage stamps so scarce that the people would be compelled to pay fifteen or twenty cents for them or go without writing to their friends, and a scarcity of money is much more unjust and tyrannical. There is not one-twentieth enough money in circulation to do the business of the country, and if there ever was a time that exigencies of the times demanded that Congress should exercise their constitutional power in issuing money, that time is now; and, in the language of the president of the National Republican League, John M. Thurston, "The man that says there is danger of getting too much money in circulation is a fool."

Respectfully, W. P. Brooks.

Lacerates Some Theories.

Charlevoix, Mich., Dec. 16, 1891.

Mr. Editor: I cannot think of getting along without my old companion of many years, the dear old Truth Seeker. I would hav to allow you to drop my name from your list, but there are so many good things in it from week to week that I cannot think of giving it up. I would rather liv on one meal a day less and hav the paper. Why, in the Friends' correspondence we are becoming acquainted with so many intellectual giants! There we find men who settle the land question with a few strokes of their pens, proving that all would be lovely if the land were only free. And yet we hear of places all over the country where men who own the land are abandoning it. Government difficulties are at once settled by doing away with all governments. Then will come the happy time of dynamite bombs. The tariff—well, the short way to settle that is, just open our ports and let everything come in free. Of course the foreign countries pay nothing toward the support of our institutions, and it is an outrage to exact anything of them for the privilege of our markets, when we hav prosperous merchants, manufactories, mechanics, and laborers who are abundantly able, and why should they not pay the whole expense of our government? Besides, it would make times in the old countries so much better if we would just open our ports. The money question—why talk of that when it is so simple? Just stamp One Dollar on a bit of paper and it is worth just as much as a gold dollar. Why, the Bank of Venice did business on paper for six hundred years, and the premium on her paper was going up so that the government had to fix the rate of premium of the paper securities at twenty per cent over gold. And yet I would not be afraid to wager that if the Man of Marengo had burnt the city and its bank, he and his men would hav burnt their fingers in poking among the ashes of the paper to find the melted gold. But the best thing of all is the knocking out of Bob's figures. That makes Bob appear small, and I guess he will wish he was dead. However that may be, long liv The Truth Seeker, pictures and all. Robert Miller.

Talmage Converted to Paganism!

Detroit, Mich., Dec. 13, 1891.

Mr. Editor: On the 11th inst., in the Detroit Rink, before a large audience which the press and clergy of this city had drummed up for the occasion, the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage gave one of his characteristic dancing-jack exhibitions and Punch and Judy shows, in the shape of a lecture entitled, "The Science of Good Cheer." The (so-called) "great divine" seemed at his best. With an unusually large and representativ audience to greet him, his physiognomic pucker-strings, suddenly becoming automatic in their action, wreathed his facial nerve-centers into a tangled mass, or reticulation of unique antics, of so grotesque and gruesome a nature that the risibilities of the audience became so exercised as to cause, as the Free Press reporter put it, "fully ninety laughs to be crowded into the hour and a half that the speaker addressed the audience, while a smile played constantly over the great preacher's countenance," etc. Now, it would be difficult for anyone not present to catch the faintest glimpse, even, of a treat so rare as to bring out "ninety laughs" from the audience and cover the lips of the speaker with a continuous ripple of smiles an hour and a half in length. After a few introductory remarks, mixed with a profusion of fulsome flattery, and a seemingly heartfelt expression of gratitude for the cordial reception accorded him, and after extending a warm (and no doubt sincere) invitation to all present to "come East and see him, to come to New York, and over to Brooklyn, and come to his house," etc., he then pulled himself together, launched at once into his subject, and with his right struck straight out from his divine shoulder and landed a "stunner" on the credulity of the audience in the following declaration: "My religion is sunshine." Now, inasmuch as the Rev. Dr. Radcliff, of this city, introduced Dr. Talmage to the audience as "a preacher of an orthodoxy as old as Calvary, but as new as the babe just born," I supposed, of course, as he began to define his religion, that he was about to say, "My religion is hell-fire and damnation for poor sinners and a gilt-edged passport to eternal rest for the rich ones." But I was disappointed when instead he said, "My religion is sunshine." And as he pronounced this, his new and brief creed, and without any reference to the Confession of Faith, or to the heresy of Professor Briggs, my mind wandered, and I was carried back to the old cynical philosopher, the immortal Diogenes, when he ordered Alexander the Great to "get out of his sunshine." By which he doubtless meant, "Get out of my religion." And here I was momentarily confounded and puzzled over the question how the Brooklyn divine—on whose lips "a smile played constantly"—could become a disciple of that old cynical philosopher. But I concluded that it must be a clear case of "obsession," and that Diogenes had come again to the front, taken possession of Talmage, and set him to talking "sunshine" instead of brimstone religion. But at this point I soon found myself in a labyrinth of religious bewilderment as to how he could hope to reconcile his new religion of sunshine with Christ's teachings when he said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned;" or with St. Paul's only religion of "Christ and him crucified." But I finally found a fire-escape from my dilemma in the reflection that Talmage's "religion of sunshine" was a new and radical departure from the religion of Christ and the Pauline religion of eighteen hundred years ago; and was a new phase or type of the Christian religion that was taking on and merging into the old Sabeans' religion of sun-worship, and that our exceptionally eccentric Brooklyn divine, late of the river Jordan baptizing episode, had, since his pilgrimage to Palestine and his sojourn in the Holy Land, become a convert to the old Oriental system of sun-worship. For, as he proclaimed his religion to be "sunshine," and as religion, according to Webster, "is a system of faith and worship," therefore, the sun, which dispenses his sunshine religion, must be the object of his worship, and hence his God. And I must say that this is not so bad a religion after all, for it has in it none of that awful "Hark from the tombs a doleful sound," etc. Nor has it any of that monstrous, selfish, brutal, ignorant, pernicious, tyrannical, and mischievous spirit of intolerance in it, which the Brooklyn divine's great teacher is said to hav promulgated some eighteen hundred years ago, more or less, when he declared that "he that believeth," etc., "shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned"—that is to say, when relieved of its false priestly translation, "shall be condemned," ecclesiastically condemned as a heretic, and put to death, not by sunshine, but by blazing fagots, as was Servetus by John Calvin the divine, and as was Bruno by order of the boss workman, the head superintendent of the great religious manufactory at Rome, and as millions hav been thus put to death by Christian divines. But I must pause here to say that I certainly do think that Talmage has made a great improvement in adopting his new "sunshine religion," and that he has got a cinch on the church and on all such "divines" as those who recently undertook to sacrifice Professor Briggs for his "heresy" against the Calvin creed and brimstone-preserved religion of the Presbyterian church. Yes, I rather like Talmage's "religion of sunshine," and really I am not surprised that his finely chiseled lips and his classic features hav become usurped by, and the resort of, a continued ripple of laughter; for I think that a sunshine religion would be a real, genuin, laughing religion—something, perhaps, of the laughing-gas kind. It has no "hell-fire and brimstone" in it—just simply sunshine—"only this, and nothing more."

But, as before observed, it is not the regular Christian religion, but it is the religion of the grand old sun-, moon-, and star-worshipers of antiquity, whose religious anthems, swelling into hymns of devotion and rising into songs of praise, echoed on the plains of Shinar when the heavens were being mapped into shining constellations and the sky girdled with the great zodiacal belt was begemmed with the twelv mystic astrologic signs whose awe-inspiring greatness, grandeur, and glory bow the wisest heads of to-day in mute silence and wonder, and whose origin is lost in the twilight of prehistoric ages, and beyond which the crumbling record of the long-forgotten nations "runneth not to the contrary," and toward which the silent, ever-gazing Sphinx points in vain. Forsooth, history in its slow, steady, snail-like pace is about to repeat itself, and the old sun-worship, with its primitiv sublimity and astronomical glory, freed from its superstitious Christian excrescences, may be on the return. And the "sunshine religion" of Talmage may be the herald "of glad tidings and great joy." Who shall say that he may not be a second John the Baptist, who comes—not from the wilderness, a poor Buddhistic mendicant missionary, clothed with "a girdle about his loins," and subsisting on "locusts and wild honey"—but on the contrary comes in luxury in comparison to which Dives was a second Lazarus, and who, seizing the age of progress by the forelock, comes as the voice of one crying in the wilderness of steeples: "Prepare ye the way for science, Liberal thought, and labor-saving machinery! Make their paths straight! And thou monster, Christian superstition, stand not on the order of going, but go at once. For I, the great Talmage, hav come to roll back the dark pall of error, clear the sky from the fog of Christianized paganism that for ages shrouded all Europe in the almost impenetrable gloom of starless night."

Peradventure he comes to sing the song of hope and good cheer to anxious friends of the supposed eternally lost and loved ones—to laugh away their agony and bring the "religion of sunshine" and the science of good cheer to sorrowing mothers, whose pillows were wet with midnight tears, shed over their supposed lost darlings, whose agonizing cries, borne on the billows of raging fire and quenchless flame, disturbed their fevered dreams, that mocked with hope, that brought no relief, no fruition, until science ushered in a new era and a brighter dawn. But, ah! I hesitate, I doubt, I fear after all that Talmage's religion of sunshine is but a ministerial lecture fad—that he is only playing off his clerical pranks, as one of his huge jokes, for which he thinks himself an expert, abundantly able and eminently qualified to carry to a success—and that his sunshine religion is mere moonshine after all. And that the people who seem to hav a penchant for being humbugged will continue to laugh when he laughs, take it all in because he says it, accept what he preaches, and leave the old cancerous tumor and gangrene superstition still gnawing away on their fears and purse-strings, that the self-styled "men of God" may continue to feast on the fat of the land, and, like Talmage, laugh at the ruin they hav wrought. Oh! were I a minister, clergyman, or priest, in this, the nineteenth century, with the light of scientific exposure of Christianity glaring me in the face, I should blush scarlet with shame, instead of turning joker and becoming the champion laughing divine, while yet the groans of those they hav eternally damned were still echoing in my ears. And I should feel a sorrow too mournful for utterance as I saw the hope of immortality which I had helped to kindle in the minds of the people by sophistry, barefaced and unsupported assertion, dying out in incredulity for want of Bible evidence, thus shrouding the grave, which they hav already made dark and dreary, in still deeper gloom; and thus showing their preaching to be a farce and a sham, and proving the great army of non-producing divines to be dishonest villains, or blind leaders of the blind. In concluding his lecture Talmage gave a description of sunrise on the sea. And, as far as I could see, it was not strikingly unlike a sunrise on our great fresh-water lakes. But in his description of the action and appearance of his sun-god on the occasion, the Brooklyn divine pulled himself together in great shape. He seemed to shake off his customary looseness. The bifurcation of his lower limbs seemed to fall into line and gather into closer relations to each other, which gave him a more comely appearance. His arms, rising to an alarming altitude, struck out from the elbows at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the plane of the rostrum. His maxillars opened and closed slowly on their hinges as if undergoing lubrication. His tongue seemed to quiver as if the muscle that held it in place was yielding to its greatest possible degree of rhetorical tension. His eyes, rolling in their sockets, alternately twinkled and glared like dewdrops on a wild violet, or stars peeping up above the brow of a distant mountain. His lips assumed a horizontal elongation of marvelous proportions. His cheeks, like a blacksmith's bellows, seemed alternately to draw in and swell out, in manner and appearance not entirely unlike a blow-snake, or as if he had but just returned from his chase after the man he forcibly and against his will baptized in the river Jordan. His ears stood out like rabbits'. And finally, all at once, as if by a preconcerted signal, all his physical paraphernalia, his mental machinery and vocal organs, assumed a seriocomic appearance, and striking a melodramatic attitude which was simply prodigious, he began his description of sunrise on the sea. And as the sublime old sun-god of day rolled his fiery chariot above the waves, rose from the deep-blue sea, and from his golden locks shook the briny spray, so he too, the great Brooklyn divine, rose to his greatest hight, when lo, with a bow, one step, and two strides, he slid, as it were, from the stage, and "set behind" the curtains to be seen no more. And thus closed the lecture on "The Science of Good Cheer." Then the audience, sick of so much talk about sunshine, sunrise, etc.—surfeited with too much good cheer and tired of so much silly laughing—mid whispers of "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity" left the Rink and went to their several homes, declaring as they passed along that Talmage's sunshine religion was too old, too cheap, too diaphanous, and that they still liked "in theirs" a religion that had a slight brimstone flavor in it, that they seemed more at home with such a religion, and besides, the ministers could not get along well without it. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

In the Vale.

I would not walk on shining hights,
Seen of all men for praise or blame,
But let me keep the lowly lights
That never gleam for pride nor fame;
To lift a broken wayside weed,
And lure a heart from night to day,
Some stricken soul that knows the need
Of tender song to cheer the way.

A half-remembered mother-hymn,
Soft bugle blown in dreams afar,
Where laughing children walked the brim
Of summer hill and golden bar.
O melody of singing birds!
O breath from blossoms dead and gone!
Sing, Nature, psalms whose latest words
May bring my sheaves their Helicon.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Clearwater, Neb., Dec. 21, 1891.

Proper Self-Respect.

At the gates of heaven an angel pressed—
An angel newly and properly made—
And she was, and she knew it, so very well dressed
That nothing in heaven could make her afraid.

Through the gates of heaven she peered at the blessed,
As through paradise streets they wandered and strayed,
And gave audible thanks that she was well dressed,
For they were in garments most shockingly made.

Every angel she saw—and to see them thus dressed
Brought a blush to the cheek of this a-la-mode maid—
Wore a radiant garment, cut, it must be confessed,
Like those in which mortals in sleep are arrayed.

A positiv pain wrung her sensitiv breast
At the sight of this garb, which decorum forbade—
And the dread that she also must be thus undressed
On her sensitiv face cast a visible shade.

Saint Peter advanced with a bow of the best—
For the saint liked the looks of the trim little maid—
And he graciously said: "When you're properly dressed,
Your harp is all ready and waits to be played."

Just one glance all disdainful she cast on the blessed
In their garments of white, to Saint Peter salaamed,
And replied: "If in heaven one can't be well dressed,
I'll go—Somewhere Else, and be well dressed and damned!"

Corner Gospel.

MORAL NEEDS.

"How shall I make my children good children?" asked a parent the other day. "By being good yourself," was my reply. "Well, I am good enough." Still you might be better. There is no such thing as perfection. If so, there would be an end to endeavor. That which you might call perfection would be simply arrested development. Do not frown upon the children. If you do they will reflect that frown upon their own little brows. Do not get so tired that you cannot bear the patter of little feet; and dear papas should never become so deeply interested in newspapers, the tariff question, or free trade as to prohibit the questions of the little ones. Let them talk. Tell them all about that which you read. Teach them to be pitiful by yourself pitying the troubled and sorrowful. Be pleased at good actions and show it by smiles, words of praise, and admiration. Be indignant at wrongs; applaud the right. Show sympathy, patience, love, kindness, forbearance, and gentleness, if you would hav children sympathetic, patient, etc. Children are the greatest imitators in the world. Teach them to avoid the bad and imitate the good.

Like plants, children need sunlight—the sunlight of love and goodness. Deny them of it and they will show the lack at once.

Story of a Dog Mother.

One of the most pathetic incidents to be read in dog biography is given by Dr. Dio Lewis in his "Life." He was traveling in the West and came to a ranch, the owner of which showed him a shepherd dog which he said he would not sell for $500. She had at that time four young puppies. While they were admiring the little mother and her babies on the night of their arrival, the assistant herder came in to say that there were more than twenty sheep missing.

Two male dogs, both larger than the little mother, were standing about, but the herder said neither Tom nor Dick would find them; Flora must go. It was urged by the assistant that her foot was sore, that she had been hard at work all day, was nearly worn out, and must giv her puppies their supper. The master insisted that she must go.

The sun was setting and there was no time to lose. Flora was called and told to hunt for lost sheep, while her master pointed to the great forest through the edge of which they had just passed. She raised her head but seemed very loath to leave her babies. The master called sharply to her. She rose, looked tired and low-spirited, and with head and tail down trotted wearily off toward the forest.

"That is too bad," said I.

"Oh, she'll be right back," was the assured answer. "She's lightning on stray sheep."

The next morning I went over to learn whether Flora had found the strays. While we were speaking, the sheep returned, driven by the little dog, who did not raise her head nor wag her tail, even when spoken to, but crawled to her puppies and lay down by them. She had been out all night, and scarcely able to notice her babies, she fell asleep.

How often that scene comes back to me! The vast, gloomy forest, and that little creature with the sore foot and her heart crying for her babies, limping and creeping about in the wild canyon, all through the long, dark hours, finding and gathering in the lost sheep.

A Helping Hand.

I am glad to see the children interested in our poor and helpless aged Liberals, and hope each one who can will send something to J. H. Cook, Columbus, Kan., and R. M. Casey, Bruno, Anderson county, S. C. Casey did a good thing for Liberalism when he got the name of Five Forks post-office changed to the noble one of Bruno, and I hope he will be remembered for that if for no other of his Liberal deeds. Both these men are needy and winter is upon them, so help is needed now if ever. Anxiously, AUNT ELMINA.

[OUR friend, Frederic May Holland, sends the following for the Corner. Our opinion is that little boys are not the only ones who say good-bye to God when they go off on a summer vacation.—ED. C. C.]

A friend of mine recently heard a clergyman at a prayer-meeting in New Jersey tell a story of a little boy in New York city who ended his prayers one night as follows: "Good-bye, God. I am going to New Jersey to-morrow morning to stay all summer."

Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 15, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I write you once more to let you know that my heart and my services are still in the interest of Freethought. I am still striving to obtain a greater knowledge of life and things of this world that I may become better fitted for activ duty, if such should ever be required of me. I want to feel myself capable of defending right and justice against superstition and oppression. My father has the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and I hav been pouring over its leaves of pictures with unabated interest.

I cannot help but think, when looking at them, how little God concerns himself about the welfare of his children on this earth. One of these pictures, in particular, leaves a convincing force upon my senses. It is a picture in two parts, No. 1 and No. 2. No. 1 represents a man (religious) with his child in his arm, his other arm uplifted with a razor in his hand, and about to kill his child. No. 2 represents a dog bringing a drowning child from the water. Which, then, of these two animals did God inspire?

I will now close or I may weary you.

Yours truly, BESSIE SCHAFFER.

[Bessie should write oftener. She has ideas, and good ones, too. We are glad to number her among our friends.—ED. C. C.]

PALOUSE CITY, WASH., Dec. 13, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I like to read it. I am very much interested in the Children's Corner. There are a good many Liberals here, but as yet we hav no Liberal organization. I am eleven years old, and sometimes go to Sunday-school for the purpose of learning what absurd trash they teach the children, but I cannot believe it myself. We liv in a beautiful country, with great fields of wheat all around us, and they look nice during the summer and fall. I wish you could see them. We liv just inside of town and hav a good place. Papa keeps bees, and we hav a great deal of honey. It is so nice; papa says it is much better than Eastern honey. I go to school, and hav just been promoted to a higher grade. There are over three hundred school-children in Palouse.

Well, my letter is already too long, so I will close. Hoping to see this in print, I remain, Your Liberal friend,

NORA ANDERSON.

[The above is a good letter for the first one, to be followed, we hope, by many more from the same source.—ED. C. C.]

OAK MILLS, KAN., Dec. 15, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Kind Friend: It is with pleasure that I again embrace the opportunity of indulging in a little chat with you and the readers of the Corner. Words are inadequate to express my gladness when I realize what a noble, intelligent crowd of boys and girls are represented in our Corner, and nothing givs me more pleasure than to chat with this happy crowd through the medium of the pen, and I only wish that I could hav the blessed pleasure of meeting them, one and all. Oh, what a happy meeting it would be!

Since I last wrote to the Corner a number of brave soldiers in the grand army of Mental Freedom hav passed away. Conspicuous among them is Dr. J. R. Monroe, the brave and fearless "ironclad" veteran of Indianapolis, Ind. Dr. Monroe was a peculiar man in some respects, yet he was a wonderful man—a self-made man. He was one of the most radical and outspoken Atheists that this country has ever produced, and no one can estimate the amount of good he has accomplished for our cause. Like our honored George W. Foote and George E. Macdonald, his writings combined the pith and point of the humorist with the grace and beauty of the poet and the deep thought of the logician. He was a great, noble-hearted man, and his memory should be justly honored.

I hav added a great many curious objects to my collection since the description of it appeared in the Corner. The following are some of the most interesting ones: Two large Indian stone pestles, one of them being over a foot in length; two Indian stone balls, a stone ax, some stone celts, a stone pipe, a flint hoe, a mound-builder's spear-head nine inches in length, several hammer-stones, a stone fishline-sinker, some flint drills, scrapers, and war-club heads, some fine pottery fragments, a copper ornament from an Indian grave in Ontario county, N. Y.; a bone whistle or call from an Indian grave on Devil's lake, in North Dakota; a curious tablet-stone from Indiana, and other Indian relics. The following relics from the Aztec ruins in New Mexico I prize more highly than all: An Aztec image made of pottery, a long string of slate and shell beads from a grave, some small arrow-points of smoky quartz, a turquoise bead, an amethyst charm, a shell charm, and some fragments of fine pottery, highly ornamented. I will furnish the readers of the Corner with a complete list of objects in my collection later on. I hav the finest collection in this state. I had other things to write about, but it would take up too much space in the Corner. Best wishes to all.

Who Really Disgrace the Flag.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to express my opinion upon Mr. Secor's abuse upon your paper of December 19th. He charges you first of all with a terrible crime—that you sympathize with Anarchists; it shows that the gentleman does not know what the Anarchists are striving for, or if he does know then he is an enemy to freedom and justice. He says that the Anarchists offended the American flag, but does not prove it—where and when they did so. I say if the American flag ever was offended, then it has been done by gentlemen like Dr. Secor, for I am sure that the American flag could not be more offended than it was in 1887 in Chicago, by hanging five heroes for nothing but preaching the gospel of freedom and justice to the workingmen. And I think that as Anarchists are also readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is proper that here and there it may be written in in behalf of our cause, but Mr. Secor I would advise to apply to that brainless and crazy Wilhelm of Germany for a position, as he is getting short of a man supplied with so much brain (?). I am sure Mr. Secor would beat Bismarck, and then he would hav a chance to deal out justice, and he would be sure of a good reward from the Anarchists. F. SYKES.

Can't We Settle This?

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Nov. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 for six months' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am one of the Freethought subscribers. I would like to ask a favor. In your issue of October 31st a Mr. W. P. Butler made a statement to this effect. He stated that he and some other gentleman, at Aberdeen, S. D., on Aug. 8, 1891, made a full and complete exposure of Mrs. Annie Abbott, known to fame as the Little Georgia Magnet, showing her alleged marvels to be clever trickery, capable of being performed by any clever lady with the proper appliances and practice. He states that they, the Abbotts, canceled all engagements and went to Canada, and that since then Mrs. Abbott had taken a position in a Chicago dime museum under a new name, her career as "Annie Abbott" having been run, owing to the wide publicity given to the exposé. By this week's papers I am told that Mrs. Abbott is now in the city of London, and has created a sensation among the scientists, who are baffled for an explanation of her peculiar powers. She has been the theme of ponderous editorials in the London Times, and in short is a nine days' wonder for all England. This does not seem to harmonize with the dime museum engagement in Chicago. I do not exactly understand it, but let it pass, as it makes no difference anyway.

I sometimes indulge in the luxury of seeking the truth. That is why I take THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some time last winter at Pythian Castle, in Sacramento, Mrs. Abbott gave several exhibitions of her alleged power, and I in common with hundreds of others either witnessed a marvelous exhibition of some unknown force or were most cleverly deceived. In broad daylight, at a distance of not over ten feet from where I stood, I saw her lift not less than nine hundred pounds of living flesh in the persons of five large men seated in chairs. She raised them a distance of not less than ten inches from the fioor with no more apparent effort than would be required to lift a feather. Her arms were bare to the elbows, thus apparently precluding the use of any mechanical appliances, electric or otherwise, and the platform on which the performance occurred was improvised of rough boards laid on benches, under which a person could see plainly, thus apparently preventing the use of any stage illusions or trickery. I confess that the audience was completely puzzled, although the wiseacres of the burg unhesitatingly pronounced it a fraud, as they are wont to do when any strange phenomena come up for investigation outside of the domain of the orthodox superstition. But as they can giv no rational reason for their superstitious beliefs, so they could giv no rational reason for their unbelief in the Abbott phenomena.

I was greatly interested in this matter, and if it is a fake I should like to know it, and I would like to know how these tricks—if tricks they are—are done. I am in no sense a Spiritualist—never went to a séance in my life—know nothing about it one way or the other, and consequently hav no prejudice for or against either Spiritualism or the Abbott phenomena, believing that if they are true they are simply strange facts in nature, beside which the alleged apparition of Lourdes is insignificant and commonplace, and if they are simply clever illusions, turn on the light and they will disappear like all other phantoms of the dark.

Mr. Butler says he has evidence to substantiate his unbelief in the Abbott phenomena. Let us hav it. Let the light shine.

News of the Week.

WAR with Chili now looks probable.

WALT WHITMAN is very weak and may die any day.

THE nativ Christians massacred in the riots in China numbered one thousand.

THE pope is so feeble that he will not liv more than six months, and may die at any time.

NEWFOUNDLAND'S continual disagreements with the English and Canadian governments will probably drive her into the United States.

IN Upper Burmah during a drouth Lieutenant Pilcher ascended a hill fifteen hundred feet high and fired off two charges of gun-cotton of thirty pounds each. Rain ensued immediately.

A RICH nativ of Hunan, China, has distributed eight hundred thousand books denouncing the "foreign devils" and the religion of "the pig Jesus" and making dreadful charges against that belief.

THE partisans of Ex-Premier Mercier of Quebec talk of armed resistance to the government. Mercier is an eminent Catholic and was recently decorated by the pope. He has the Catholics of Canada behind him.

ON the 20th ult. in Puebla, Mexico, twenty-six priests arrested for plotting against the government were attempted to be rescued by a mob. One soldier was wounded, and one rioter shot fatally and one wounded.

ANNIE BESANT speaks in glowing terms of American audiences, dwelling upon the multitudes in the States willing to pay a dollar to hear her lecture. In England, as she points out, only scant audiences attend her lectures, even when no charge for admission is made.

THE quarantine officers at the New York port hav got news of the outbreak of that destructiv epidemic, Asiatic typhus, in one of the famin-stricken provinces of Russia, from which thousands of immigrants are coming to this country every week. The dread of its spreading westward has influenced the governments of Austria and Germany to consider the necessity of establishing a strict quarantine along the eastern frontier of these countries.

THREE months ago Bob Sims, the leader of a religious company in Choctaw county, Ala., was arrested for running an illicit distillery, which he claimed he had divine authority to run. Two of his brothers, fellow-believers, rescued him, killing a bystander and wounding the deputy in charge. One of the brothers was killed. Sims and the other brother escaped, and hav been hunted vigorously ever since. On the 23d ult. Sims and his gang reappeared near Womack Hill and attacked the house of John McMillan, who had been a member of the pursuing posse. Sims was chased and killed.

RUSSELL SAGE is to be sued for $100,000 damages by W. R. Laidlaw, the clerk for John Bloodgood & Co., who was so terribly injured by the explosion of the bomb in Mr. Sage's office. Laidlaw declares that Sage deliberately used him as a shield against the dynamiter. But for this, he says, Sage would either hav been killed or made to suffer as he, Laidlaw, has suffered. Laidlaw's worst injury was in the back, where he was struck by a piece of timber. "This piece of timber," he said, "would hav struck Mr. Sage in the stomach if I had not been standing before him, and I would not hav been standing before him if he had not held me there. There can be no doubt that his act of placing me between himself and the dynamiter was deliberate and saved his life."

THE Socialists in Germany hav formulated their immediate demands, which are for universal suffrage without distinction as to sex, a secret ballot, proportionate representation, voting on Sundays or holidays, the payment of members, the popular right to initiate or reject legislation, popular control of the state, provincial and communal administrations, annual votes on taxation, a popular decision as to peace or war, the creation of international arbitration tribunals, the right of free speech and free meetings, the abolition of state subventions to churches, the secularization of the schools, free education, universal military instruction, militia replacing the standing army, free justice, that judges be elected by the people, gratuitous medicin, state-supported doctors, a progressiv income tax, the abolition of indirect taxation, eight hours for a day's work, unbroken repose for thirty-six hours weekly for every workman, state surveillance of factories, mines, and other industries, the formation of labor bureaus, the coöperation of workmen in the administration, universal state insurance, prohibiting the employment of children under fourteen years of age, the prohibition of the truck system, and the right of workmen to form coalitions.

Gems of Thought.

BECAUSE I differ with my parents, because I am convinced that my father was wrong in some of his religious opinions, Mr. Talmage insists that I disgrace my parents. How did the Christian religion commence? Did not the first disciples advocate theories that their parents denied? Were they not false—in his sense of the word—to their fathers and mothers? How could there hav been any progress in this world if children had not gone beyond their parents? Do you consider that the inventor of a steel plow cast a slur upon his father, who scratched the ground with a wooden one?—Ingersoll.

ANOTHER great difficulty in receiving the Bible as the word of God is the manner in which its books hav been chosen. A large number of apocryphal books are known to hav been excluded from the Old Testament, though quotations from some of them appear to be used by the apostles; and the New Testament is the result of the votes of councils, some gospels and epistles having been rejected, while other epistles were retained by a bare majority, but all henceforth is the infallible word of God. When we revolt against inconsistency and error in it, we are told the finite must not judge the infinit, reason must giv place to faith. But it is faith in the Christian fathers that is needed.—Robt. C. Adams.

IT is a source of great satisfaction to me that that distinguished litterateur, the Ghost—usually yclept the Holy Ghost, for some reason I hav been unable to make out—has quite given up the literary profession. Nobody else would hav had any chance against him. He has written one book only, or rather a series of small tracts tacked together by nothing else but the binding. And, O Jerusalem, what a sale the work has! The Ghost's principal publishers in London are in Queen Victoria street, and his book goes off in hundreds of thousands of tons annually. Its sale seems to be, in great part, attributable to the fact that the work is written by the king of Heaven and dedicated to the king of England. All books proceeding from royal pens are, in character, quite exceptional, from the olden royal volume that treats of Abraham down to the recent royal volume that immortalizes Brown. Any ordinary mortal would hav supposed that the Ghost would hav found his publisher in Holywell street; but the Ghost is no ordinary mortal. He had the effrontery to offer his book in a far other locality; and effrontery was rewarded with its frequent concomitant, success. The profits out of his book alone must render the Ghost the wealthiest member of the trinity. Some optimists, including myself, are sanguin that he may yet buy out the other members of the firm. Much might reasonably be expected from this anticipated transaction. The father's character is exceedingly questionable; the son, to put it mildly, is generally suspected to be somewhat queer in the upper story; while the Ghost has many negativ merits. True, he got into some sort of scrape over a girl in Palestine; but generous minds will not make too much of this; and all else that is known of him is that he once transformed himself into a pigeon, and that he once, on a pentecostal occasion, took the form of "cloven tongues as of fire." Those who hav observed a pile of Pfeysandu tongues in a shop window can easily gather what the Ghost is like by fancying each tongue to be of red-hot iron, and cloven—that is, split, as boys split a magpie's tongue with a sixpence to make it speak.—Saladin.

I KNOW it is contended by many that the sage should never develop his opinions to the vulgar; that he should be a madman with the mad, and foolish among fools; no one, however, has yet ventured to say that he should be a knave among knaves. But if it be required that a sage should always join in opinion with the deluders of mankind, is not this clearly the same as requiring that he should not be an honest man? Would anyone require that a respectable physician should always be of the same opinion as charlatans? The sage is a physician of souls. He ought to bestow his remedies on those who ask them of him, and avoid the company of quacks, who will infallibly persecute him. If therefore a madman of Asia Minor, or a madman of India, says to the sage, My good friend, I think you do not believe in the mare Borac, or in the metamorphoses of Vishnoo; I will denounce you, I will hinder you from being bostangi, I will destroy your credit, I will persecute you; the sage ought to pity him and be silent. If ignorant persons, but at the same time persons of good understanding and dispositions, and willing to receive instruction, should ask him, Are we bound to believe that the distance between the moon and Venus is only five hundred leagues, . . . as the principal fathers of the Mussulman religion insist, in opposition to all the most learned astronomers? the sage may reply to them that the fathers may possibly be mistaken.—Voltaire.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:

Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I hav been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

DAVID'S GOD.

There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals were kindled by it. He bowed the heavens also, and came down; and darkness was under his feet. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.—Psalms xviii, 8, 9, 10, 14.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Violation of Our Rights.

There is a practice in the postal department of the United States which we desire each lover of liberty to speak against at every opportunity. It is the opening of private letters by the mail officials to whom they hav been delivered for transportation. We hav from time to time called attention to cases of this nature, and now a Washington official describes these occurrences as follows: "I noticed a short time ago that some objection was made by a Mr. Pell, of the San Domingo Shore Line road, to the opening of a private letter by the chief of the secret service bureau. It is not generally known that the rules of the post-office department empower inspectors to open suspicious letters at discretion. The public appear to be very much astonished at this proceeding mentioned, but I assure you that it is carried to a greater extent than even those who know all about it suppose. In fact, under the rules of the post-office department, almost any private letter can be opened and read. This will surprise some people, I presume, but it is nevertheless true, and a reference to the private instructions to post-office inspectors, which are in printed form, will convince anybody of it. Whether such secret privileges are ever used illegitimately would be difficult to find out. It is a good deal like arresting a man on suspicion. As a matter of fact, therefore, you will see the United States mails are no more sacred than the mails in Russia or any other country so far as government espionage is concerned."

This practice is a gross and abominable outrage. The impudence of public servants in prying into the character of written or printed matter which they hav been paid to transport is most reprehensible. The abuse must be checked. The inviolability of the mails is one of the dearest and most fundamental of the liberties of a people. One can not help fearing that a community who permit this right to be trampled on could, on occasion, be easily inveigled into yielding still other rights. Some may not appreciate the peril of allowing these precedents to be established—of permitting this custom to become rooted—but they will perceive the evil when there arrives at some time in the future some social trouble, over labor or ecclesiasticism or other matter, and the controling party utilizes this permission to domineer over private communication as an engin and means of tyranny.

Rain-Makers, Clerical and Scientific.

A New York paper declares the theory that rain can be produced by the methods recently essayed in the West, to be utterly unsupported by evidence or even by probability. The journal blames Congress for having appropriated money for experiments which it had no ground to believe of value. It argues:

"It is true that many worthy, ignorant persons believe that noise creates rain, but in the same way many persons believe that the quantity and quality of crops are determined by the phase of the moon at the time of planting. Why should not Congress hav appropriated money for experiments to test that theory?

"Again there are millions of persons in this country who attribute the ills that befall them to things supposed to bring 'bad luck,' such as carrying agricultural implements through dwellings, seeing the new moon over the wrong shoulder, turning back after starting on a journey, milking cows upon stones and the like. If these superstitions are true it would be of incalculable benefit to the people to hav the fact established. Why then does not Congress appropriate money for an inquiry into their accuracy?

"The first step of a great government before ordering experiments touching a matter within the domain of science should be to consult scientific authority as to the possibility of there being anything to investigate."

We hav not many remarks to make on this matter. We thought that our readers in the West would like to be kept informed on the latest opinion for or against the theory which gave them such pleasing hopes, so we reproduced this view.

However, we earnestly wish that the adverse paper's view may not turn out to be correct. It would be indeed a gratifying thing for the power of regulating rain to fall into the hands of the scientists and the farmers. This triumph and power of the devotees of science and the practicers of labor would indirectly effect a highly desirable diminution of the importance of the dealers in supernatural means of controling nature.

This brings us to the reflection that this government is paying large sums annually to a class of experimenters who hav produced far less proof of their abilities than those whom the above-quoted journal thinks hav not deserved appropriations. Our national and state governments, by salaries and appropriations and exemptions, expend vast treasure every year on a great corps of professionals who hav never furnished an iota of evidence that they can work any results of good to the people whatever. If the journal thinks the rain-making expenditure unwise, it must think the one of which we speak monstrously so. "Many persons," it says, "believe that the quantity and quality of crops are determined by the phase of the moon at the time of planting," and it thinks ridiculous the idea of Congress testing this theory. Then what does it think of Congress not even testing, but unhesitatingly lavishing money to practice, the theory that crops are improved in quantity and quality, and all human affairs prospered, by the sprinkling of water, the making of cabalistic signs, and other formalities equally absurd as the observance of the phases of the moon? The journal finds a deal of fun in the conceptions of Congress testing the unluckiness of "carrying agricultural implements through dwellings, seeing the new moon over the wrong shoulder, turning back after starting on a journey, milking cows upon stones, and the like." Will not the paper favor us with a little more in this vein, and say what it thinks of the government not investigating, but accepting uninvestigated, the notions that good luck attends the muttering of magic spell-words, the invoking of good and the exorcising of evil spirits, and the countless other mummeries for which the state daily expends our hard-earned dollars?

The Psalms.

The censure which has long been directed by Infidels against those passages of scripture which evince in the author, and encourage in the reader, a disposition of vindictivness and malevolence, is now being taken up by Christians in their turn. They hav long resisted the Infidel indignation at these infamous pieces of scripture but at last the more honest among them can no longer bring themselvs to laud and disseminate sentiments such as these.

The latest movement of this sort on their part was made at a meeting of Baptist ministers in this vicinity. Rev. W. Case, of Holmdel, N. J., read a paper on the Imprecatory Psalms. He said that the Psalms which hav been most viciously attacked by the critics are the 35th, the 58th, the 69th, and the 109th. There are passages in other Psalms similar to the controverted passages in these, but those other passages are not of the length nor of the sustained, and, as the critics would say, vituperativ strength of the passages in the Psalms mentioned above.

In the 35th Psalm David prays these things against his enemies:

"Let them be as the dust before the wind, and the angel of the Lord scattering them.

"Let their way be dark and slippery: and let the angel of the Lord persecute them."

In the 58th Psalm is this passage:

"Break their teeth, O God, in their mouths: smite the jawbones of the lions, O Lord: let them fall away like water that runs apace: and when they shoot their arrows, let them be rooted out.

"Let them consume away like a snail, and be like the untimely fruit of a woman: and let them not see the sun.

"The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked."

In the 69th Psalm are found the following words:

"Let their eyes be blinded that they see not; and ever bow down their backs.

"For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk how they may vex them whom thou hast wounded. Let them be wiped out of the book of the living, and not be written among the righteous."

The 109th Psalm is regarded by adverse critics as the most inexcusable of all. In it are these words:

"Let his prayer be turned into sin. Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow. Let his children be vagabonds and beg their bread; let them seek it also out of desolate places. Let there be no man to pity him, nor to hav compassion upon his fatherless children. Let his posterity be destroyed.

"Let it thus happen from the Lord unto mine enemies, and to those that speak evil against my soul."

Christians who hav found fault with these powerful imprecations hav pointed to them as proof positiv that the psalmist could not hav been verbally inspired in the production of his songs, that the Lord would never hav encouraged such a lack of charity and loving-kindness as these invectivs betray. Mr. Case himself made some sorry attempts at defense of the texts, but no other clergyman present joined in his endeavors or seemed confident that this sort of writing is the right thing.

Reluctantly and falteringly, it is true, but nevertheless surely, the Christians are following our lead into the paths of truth, outspokenness, and right feeling.

Russia.

The eyes of the civilized world are turned upon Russia at present, and the interest taken in that nation induces the publication of much information on it in all of its aspects. The most valuable of this information we endeavor to keep our readers supplied with. Russia is the most profitable object-lesson conceivable for those who need to be shown the injuriousness of religion and despotism.

Nature has provided Russia with ample means of subsistence. Southern Russia might be compared to the basin of the Mississippi. It has its teeming population, its soil of inexhaustible richness, its abundant harvests, and, in the rough, all its vast potentialities of prosperous production. Nature has done her best, and if the country has not come up to the standard of nature, the blame must be laid elsewhere. The whole region is fitted, not for starvation, but for feeding the world. The fact is that the great farming regions of Southern Russia are comparable only with those of the Western United States in extent and fertility. The yield per acre from these fields compares not unfavorably with that in Dakota and California. If the land were tilled as intelligently as in America it would be fully as productiv. But the modes of tillage are wretched almost beyond belief. The peasant often plows with a stick. The extremest ignorance and waste prevail in all his methods. Ecclesiastical and governmental tyranny hav kept him void of information and destitute of appliances, and hav crushed out of him every vestige of spirit, independence, and enterprise. The truth is, famin always prevails in Russia to a greater or less extent. Sometimes its ravages are confined to single provinces; then it is known as the golodovka, or the little hunger, which is never absent from some part of the empire. At other times it is national in its magnitude. The present famin is of such an extent that, in the words of one describer, "Within the next six months more Russians will perish from starvation than hav died in all her wars." Government officials report, not on rough estimate, but after careful investigation, that more than thirty-two million people in European Russia are at this moment in danger of actual starvation—a danger that can be averted only by extraneous aid. Multitudes hav perished already. The stories of individual suffering and death, of murder and suicide, of frantic and fatal efforts to maintain life against the heaviest odds, almost surpass belief. The Novoe Vremya tells one of a man and his two children found dying in the streets of Kiev. Restored for a moment, one of the children attempted to explain the cause of their condition. "We had nothing at all to eat," she said, "and when we cried for bread, father said we would be better dead. He put some poison in the beer and gave it to my brother and myself, and then he drank the rest. We took it because father said we should never be hungry any more. My brother——" but she became unconscious again and soon died, with the unfinished tale upon her lips. The same paper relates another story that illustrates most vividly the desperation of the starving. "One woman, a type of many," it says, "maddened by the pangs of hunger, left her husband and sold herself to an unmarried man, taking all the children with her to his house. 'At least I shall hav food,' she said in defense of her course, 'and it will be easier for my husband to rub along for a time without such a charge as the young ones and myself.'" Many hav had no bread for two or three weeks, and are sustaining life as best they may on grass and the leaves of trees. Pigweed, the sale of which has enabled many an unscrupulous speculator to add to his fortune, and the refuse left after the manufacture of linseed oil, are also used for food.

The only available food of some millions is what is called "hunger bread." The only ingredient of this that bears any relation to proper food consists of mill-sweepings and mill-yard scrapings. The latter is simply the upper layer of the ground surrounding the mill. It consists, of course, of a certain percentage of flour and grain, that has been trampled into the soil, but which has become almost entirely rotten. The remainder of the "hunger-loaf" is made up of the bark of trees, moss, and the leaves and roots of various weeds. How wholesome the "hunger-loaf" is may be imagined from the fact that farmers will not feed the mill-sweepings—its best ingredient—to their cattle, because, as they say, it causes spasms and bloating and fatal diseases, and does not even temporarily satisfy the cravings of hunger. And yet that is the only food that is being put into millions of human stomachs. Worse than this, in many places this "hunger-food" is made entirely without a trace of grain, its component parts being bark, chopped straw, pigweed, and the powdered excrement of cattle. This is the only food of millions.

In a month or six weeks, at most, it is calculated, the wretched resources of "hunger-food" even will be exhausted, and the famin will reach its culmination. The case is now unspeakably terrible. What it will be then defies imagination.

Yet, says a Tribune correspondent, "wretched as he is, the Russian peasant is so hardened, so callous, that he scarcely seems to realize his condition. Only the most extreme provocation can rouse his spirit. A few weeks ago, the sight of thousands of bushels of grain being shipped out of the country did madden him, and there was a wild outbreak of wrath. But even that has now subsided. The cry was raised that it was the Jewish speculators who were exporting grain, and so the wrath of the populace was deftly turned upon the much-suffering children of Israel. The truth is that no Jews were concerned in the grain shipments at all. The speculators were, every one of them, orthodox Greek Christians."

The measures taken against the famin are characteristically Russian. When the famin was foretold a year ago by the minister of finance, the clergy were the first to move against it—not with food and money, but with all the prayers prescribed in the official liturgy for such an occasion. These failing, the ignorant and superstitious peasants resorted to their time-honored plan to meet the threatened crisis. They unearthed the bodies of drunkards and threw them into rivers, lakes, and ponds in the pious belief that it would open the fountains of heaven and drench the thirsty fields with copious showers.

A communication from Russia confirms previous reports as to the manner in which the religious persecution has produced the famin, as follows:

"The customary system in the grain-producing districts of Russia is for the Jewish merchants to go about the country and buy the growing crops as they stand and advance the money to the owner for his harvesting expenses. This advance is most essential, because the landowner livs always upon his next year's profits and has no ready money of his own. This year, with a prospect of exile and spoliation staring him in the face, the Jew has done very little buying of any sort. His whole notion has been to realize, not invest. The result is that whole grain districts exist where no purchasers hav come around at all, and where the proprietors, getting no cash advanced, were unable to harvest more than an infinitesimal portion of their crops. I personally saw numerous evidences of this, and in Odessa received proofs that it is widespread."

Another dispatch (to the New York Times, to which we are indebted for several other of these items) repeats the information:

"One of the chief factors in Odessa's present tribulation is the enforced idleness or absence of the small Jewish middlemen, who formerly went through the grain country buying the crops as they stood and advancing the money for the harvesting expenses. This year, from fear of confiscation or expulsion before they could sell again, and also from their inability to get credit at the banks, they made no purchases. As a result, in whole rich districts the crops were never cut at all, but rotted where they stood."

Dreadful epidemics are springing up as a consequence of innutrition and the eating of deleterious foods. And to make matters worse, the peasants follow implicitly the orders of the clergy to depend solely on cures by faith, prayer, miracles, pilgrimages, holy relics, and additional fees to the priests. The people often oppose physicians. As if this were not enough—as if there were to be no end to the ills that follow in religion's train—the peasants are given to superstitious practices that abet the maladies. In the medical journal Russkaya Medicina, Dr. Skvortsoff, of Kostroma, complains that it is impossible for the profession to work successfully against the superstitious prejudices of the people in the case of contagious diseases. The men can sometimes be convinced by the learned physician to follow his prescriptions, but the women of the lower classes persevere in their superstitions with great tenacity. Dr. Skvortsoff says:

"I came to a village where scarlet fever was raging. At the bedside of a dying patient I found a number of children assembled to pay their respect to Mother Scarlet Fever. I ordered the children to be taken out of the room forthwith, lest they get infected with the terrible disease. The men present were willing to obey me, but the women objected. The children must stay in the room and eat of the food placed before them on a table near the bed of the invalid in order to propitiate 'Little Mother Scarlet Fever.' In another place a woman was brought to me suffering with chronic catarrh in the bowels and in the last stage of consumption. She had a child nourishing at her breast, whom she fed at intervals with crackers which she chewed up for him. I ordered her to stop nourishing or feeding the child with her expectoration. Her husband urged her to follow my advice, but she flatly refused to do so, for 'a child not nourished by its own mother will never be recognized as one of legitimate birth.' There are thousands of superstitions of this kind which foil all the medical scientists in their fight against contagious diseases."

Under the oppressiv and stunting despotism of the church and the state all activities languish. Viestnik Europy, a monthly magazine of St. Petersburg, shows that the Russian export trade of last year was less by seventy-six million rubles than that of the year previous. "This deterioration is the more sensible since our export trade is, at its best, very small in comparison with that of other governments." The trade of the interior has suffered in an equal proportion. Despite the protectiv tariff the sale of foreign goods in Russia steadily increases, while in the foreign markets, those of Persia and of Bokhara included, the demand for Russian wares steadily diminishes. Among the reasons for the deterioration the magazine from which we quote assigns the bad quality of Russian goods. "The foreign markets complain that our lumber is badly assorted; our flax is not properly cleaned and it is subject to rottenness if it is not immediately upon its arrival properly attended to; our liquors must be rectified and cleared of empyreumatical substances before the foreigners can use them; our steel and iron are as inconsistent as lead, not to speak of our manufactured goods, which are never of good quality." Such is the commercial morality that attends the prevalence of Christianity in its highest intensity and fullest force.

In the delightful land of Russia no man can exist without a passport. When the police take this passport away he is no longer alive in any civic sense. Every privilege appertaining to his human estate is suspended. He can appeal to no one. If it is the whim of some choleric barbarian in epaulets to send him to Siberia, off he must go, with no more chance of escape or redress than a captured fish flapping in the sportsman's basket. Even if he be a stranger, with the passport of a foreign government, he is equally powerless. Only this past month Mr. Joseph Pennell had his passport taken from him at Berdichef, and was refused permission to either telegraph or write to the British consulate at Kiev or the American legation at St. Petersburg. It eventually pleased the provincial authorities to transport him to the western frontier. If they had decided to send him eastward instead, he would simply hav disappeared into Siberia without a sign.

Among the instructiv and amusing pieces of information on Russia for which there is at present such a demand, is the following in the Sun:

"In an almanac printed in Revel the statement is made that in some parts of Russia it is customary for a clergyman, officiating at a funeral, to put in the deceased's hands a letter with the following contents: 'We, by the grace of God minister of the —— church, write this to our master and friend St. Peter, the gatekeeper of the Lord Almighty. We announce to you that the servant of the Lord, N. N. [name of the deceased], has finished his life on earth, and we order you to admit him into the kingdom of heaven without delay, for we hav absolved all his sins and granted him salvation. You will obey our order on sight of this document which we put into his hand.'"

We find in the same paper the information that many Russians practice idolatry;

"A Russian missionary traveling through the Patchersky district found a sleigh packed with idols tied to a tree. On inquiring he found out that it belonged to a widow of the Greek church, who had consecrated them to the memory of her husband, also a professor of the Christian faith. All the Russians of that district keep such idols hidden in their houses, and believe in them as in real divinities. Their principal divinity they call Moom or Eelevbart. They believe that divinities of a second order, called Taadeptsy, exist in the woods and fields, and are capable of doing men harm or good. Their ministers or 'seers' carry sticks with the images of various Taadeptsy rudely carved at the upper end. They are called in the popular dialect Kheguees."

Underneath the fell structure of ecclesiasticism and officialism some points of which we hav set forth, there exists in a condition of hopelessness and mute suffering the Russian peasant who wears boots of bast instead of leather, does not even know what a bed is, never eats meat or butter, but plods on as stupidly and as hopelessly as his oxen. "They come into the world like insects, and die like summer flies."

Horrible is the spectacle which Holy Russia offers to the world. Appalling are the fruits of despotism and Christianity.

Colonel Ingersoll Quashes Dr. Buckley.

From the Evening Telegram.

In the issue of Saturday, December 19th, the Evening Telegram published as a contribution to the literature of the time a Christmas Sermon contributed to its columns by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. The remarks of the great unbeliever did not please Dr. Buckley, the editor of the Christian Advocate, the official organ of the Methodist church. The Christian Advocate of the date of December 24th, under the head of "Lies That Are Monstrous," attacks Colonel Ingersoll and the Evening Telegram with abuse, putting some of the statements of the "Christmas Sermon" and certain passages of scripture in parallel columns by way of reply.

In the course of its article the Christian Advocate calls upon people of all religious faiths of this land, Catholic and Protestant, Jew and Christian, to boycott the Evening Telegram for exercising its right of printing news and the sentiments of people of all shades of belief and disbelief—which, in the widest sense of the term, are comprehended under the head of "news."

THE CHRISTMAS SERMON.

The publication to which Dr. Buckley objected is as follows:

The good part of Christmas is not always Christian—it is generally pagan; that is to say, human, natural.

Christianity did not come with tidings of great joy, but with a message of eternal grief. It came with the threat of everlasting torture on its lips. It meant war on earth and perdition hereafter.

It taught some good things—the beauty of love and kindness in man. But as a torch-bearer, as a bringer of joy, it has been a failure. It has given infinit consequences to the acts of finite beings, crushing the soul with a responsibility too great for mortals to bear. It has filled the future with fear and flame and made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, destined to be the home of nearly all the sons of men. Not satisfied with that, it has deprived God of the pardoning power.

And yet it may hav done some good by borrowing from the pagan world the old festival called Christmas.

Long before Christ was born the Sun-god triumphed over the powers of darkness. About the time that we call Christmas the days begin perceptibly to lengthen. Our barbarian ancestors were worshipers of the sun, and they celebrated his victory over the hosts of Night. Such a festival was natural and beautiful. The most natural of all religions is the worship of the sun. Christianity adopted this festival. It borrowed from the pagans the best it has.

I believe in Christmas and in every day that has been set apart for joy. We, in America, hav too much work and not enough play. We are too much like the English.

I think it was Heinrich Heine who said that he thought a blaspheming Frenchman was a more pleasing object to God than a praying Englishman. We take our joys too sadly. I am in favor of all the good free days—the more the better.

Christmas is a good day to forgiv and forget, a good day to throw away prejudices and hatreds, a good day to fill your heart and your house, and the hearts and houses of others, with sunshine.

The passages to which exception is taken were the second paragraph, the last two sentences of the third paragraph, and the last paragraph but one.

In reply to Dr. Buckley Colonel Ingersoll has furnished the Evening Telegram with the following interview:

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S REJOINDER.

"What hav you to say to the charges made by Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate? He says that there are 'mountainous lies' in your Christmas sermon published in the Telegram."

"I am much obliged to you for showing me the paper. There is in the article the true Christian spirit. Whenever an orthodox editor attacks an unbeliever, look out for kindness, charity, and love.

"The gentle editor of the Christian Advocate charges me with having written three 'gigantic falsehoods,' and he points them out as follows:

"First—'Christianity did not come with tidings of great joy, but with a message of eternal grief.'

"Second—'It (Christianity) has filled the future with fear and flame, and made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, destined to be the home of nearly all the sons of men.'

"Third—'Not satisfied with that, it (Christianity) has deprived God of the pardoning power.'

"Now let us take up these 'gigantic falsehoods' in their order and see whether they are in accord with the New Testament or not—whether they are supported by the creed of the Methodist church.

"I insist that Christianity did not come with tidings of great joy, but with a message of eternal grief.

"According to the orthodox creeds, Christianity came with the tidings that the human race was totally depraved, and that all men were in a lost condition—and that all who rejected or failed to believe the new religion would be tormented in eternal fire.

AN APT COMPARISON.

"These were not tidings of great joy.

"If the passengers on some great ship were told that the ship was to be wrecked—that a few would be saved, and that nearly all would go to the bottom—would they talk about 'tidings of great joy?' It is to be presumed that Christ knew what his mission was, and what he came for. He says: 'Think not that I am come to send peace on the earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother.' In my judgment, these are not tidings of great joy.

"Now, as to the message of eternal grief?—

"'Then shall he say also to them on the left hand, Depart from me ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.'

"'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous [meaning the Methodists] into life eternal.'

"'He that believeth not shall be damned.'

"'He that believeth not the son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.'

"'Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.'

"'And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever.'

"Knowing, as we do, that but few people hav been believers, that during the last eighteen hundred years not one in a hundred has died in the faith, and that consequently nearly all the dead are in hell, it can truly be said that Christianity came with a message of eternal grief.

AN ETERNAL PENITENTIARY.

"Now, as to the second 'gigantic falsehood' to the effect that Christianity filled the future with fear and flame, and made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, destined to be the home of nearly all the sons of men.

"In the Old Testament there is nothing about punishment in some other world, nothing about the flames and torments of hell. When Jehovah killed one of his enemies he was satisfied. His revenge was glutted when the victim was dead. The Old Testament gave the future to sleep and oblivion. But in the New Testament we are told that the punishment in another world is everlasting and that the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever.

"This awful doctrin, these frightful texts, filled the future with fear and flame. Building on these passages, the orthodox churches hav constructed a penitentiary, in which nearly all the sons of men are to be imprisoned and tormented forever, and of this prison God is the keeper. The doors are opened only to receive.

"The doctrin of eternal punishment is the infamy of infamies. As I hav often said, the man who believes in eternal torment, in the justice of endless pain, is suffering from at least two diseases—petrifaction of the heart and putrefaction of the brain.

GOD'S PARDONING POWER.

"The next question is whether Christianity has deprived God of the pardoning power.

"The Methodist church and every orthodox church teaches that this life is a period of probation; that there is no chance given for reformation after death; that God givs no opportunity to repent in another world.

"This is the doctrin of the Christian world. If this dogma be true, then God will never release a soul from hell—the pardoning power will never be exercised.

"How happy God will be and how happy all the saved will be, knowing that billions and billions of his children, of their fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and children, are convicts in the eternal dungeons, and that the words of pardon will never be spoken!

"Yet this is in accordance with the promis contained in the New Testament of happiness here and eternal joy hereafter to those who would desert brethren or sisters, or father or mother, or wife or children.

"It seems to me clear that Christianity did not bring 'tidings of great joy,' but that it came with a 'message of eternal grief'—that it did 'fill the future with fear and flame,' that it did make 'God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary,' that the penitentiary 'was destined to be the home of nearly all the sons of men,' and that 'it deprived God of the pardoning power.'

"Of course you can find passages full of peace in the Bible, others of war—some filled with mercy and others cruel as the fangs of a wild beast.

"According to the Methodists, God has an eternal prison—an everlasting Siberia. There is to be an eternity of grief, of agony and shame.

NO IDEA OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY.

"What do you think of what the doctor says about the Telegram for having published your Christmas sermon?"

"The editor of the Christian Advocate has no idea of what intellectual liberty means. He ought to know that a man should not be insulted because another man disagrees with him. What right has Dr. Buckley to disagree with Cardinal Gibbons, and what right has Cardinal Gibbons to disagree with Dr. Buckley? The same right that I hav to disagree with them both.

"I do not warn people against reading Catholic or Methodist papers or books. But I do tell them to investigate for themselvs—to stand by what they believe to be true, to deny the false and, above all things, to preserve their mental manhood. The good doctor wants the Telegram destroyed—wants all religious people to unite for the purpose of punishing the Telegram—because it published something with which the reverend doctor does not agree, or rather that does not agree with the doctor.

"It is too late. That day has faded in the west of the past. The doctor of theology has lost his power. Theological thunder has lost its lightning—it is nothing now but noise, pleasing those who make it and amusing those who hear.

"The Telegram has nothing to fear. It is, in the highest sense, a newspaper—wideawake, alive, always on time, good to its friends, fair with its enemies, and true to the public."

ABUSE PROVES NOTHING.

"What hav you to say to the doctor's personal abuse?"

"Nothing. A man may call me a devil, or the devil, or he may say that I am incapable of telling the truth, or that I tell lies, and yet all this proves nothing. My arguments remain unanswered.

"I cannot afford to call Dr. Buckley names. I hav good mental manners. The cause I represent (in part) is too great, too sacred, to be stained by an ignorant or a malicious personality.

"I know that men do as they must do with the light they hav, and so I say:—More light!"

Was Christ Crucified?—(Concluded).

BY A MEMBER OF THE CHICAGO BAR.

A further incredible procedure is that no witnesses for the defense were allowed to testify. We are told that as soon as the case for the prosecution was made out the high priest asked, "What further need have we of witnesses . . . What think ye?" and we are told that "they answered and said, He is worthy of death." Now, in all Jewish times the right to put in a defense was guarded with most scrupulous care for the protection of the accused; and to condemn one on the completion of the prosecution's testimony alone, would be to end the trial in the middle, in fact to give no trial at all.

In the next place, Jesus could not have been legally condemned to death by the Sanhedrim for the offense alleged. Blasphemy was not then punishable by death, although that is the charge on which, according to the Gospels, he was condemned. Nor was any similar offense into which his conduct might have been construed, punishable by death.

Nor was the utterance blasphemous for which he was declared guilty of blasphemy. Blasphemy among the Jews had a strict technical meaning, and the law had to regard the technicality in criminal trials. Blasphemy consisted in the mention of the divine name, and the Mishna states that the blasphemer was not guilty until he expressed the name. To claim that he was the Messiah was not blasphemy. The Jews looked for a Messiah, and they would have been extremely illogical to put to death one who should present himself as the man whom they wanted. Even a false claim to be the Messiah was not blasphemous, and at the trial the Jews did not even consider the truth of his claim, but, according to the Gospels, pronounced him guilty from the fact that he made the claim, saying, according to Matthew, "He hath spoken blasphemy. What further need have we of witnesses?" Nor was it blasphemous to claim that he was the son of God. Every son of Israel was sometimes called a son of God, and the term had too many meanings to be legally criminal per se.

It will thus appear that no such trial as that recorded in the Gospels could have taken place had the Jews observed their own regulations. If any trial occurred at all, it was a very different or else a wholly illegal one. It is hard to believe that such a body as the Sanhedrim, the high ecclesiastical council of a great people, would act so contrary to so many of their laws and traditions, and with most remarkable unanimity; and it is still more difficult to believe that they would do this when they could in most respects have just as easily complied with their law, and so made their acts at least technically legal.

If we look, in the next place, at the part which the Romans are alleged by the Gospels to have played in the trial and crucifixion of Jesus, we find an equally unlawful and improbable procedure. We have said that the Romans could not have crucified Jesus for the offense charged. They would not have crucified him for any offense against the Jewish religion, or have delivered him over to the Jews for crucifixion if he had been found guilty of a crime against the Roman laws. It is commonly claimed that he was first condemned to death by the Jews for an alleged crime against Jewish law, and then taken by them to the Roman authorities and charged with a violation of Roman law—treason, or disloyalty to Cæsar, in setting himself up as a king, and stirring up the people. But this position is not tenable, since Pilate, the Roman ruler of the country, found him innocent of any such Roman offense, and so declared. "I find no fault in him," he says, or according to another Gospel, "I have found no cause of death in him." It is difficult to believe that the highest Roman official of the land, the pro-consul, standing in Cæsar's place, and having the Roman traditional pride in justice, or at least regard for its form, would outrage all appearance of justice by condemning a man to death whom in the same breath he declared to be innocent. In all history there is not such an infamous or illegal sentence as that ascribed to Pilate by John, "Take ye him and crucify him; for I find no fault in him."

It is obvious, moreover, that Pilate did not deliver Jesus to the Jews to be crucified, since the crucifixion was, according to John, conducted wholly by Roman officials. Pilate scourged him, the soldiers plaited a crown of thorns and put it on his head, Pilate wrote the inscription for the cross, the soldiers crucified him and cast lots for his garment, one of the soldiers thrust a spear in his side, and Pilate disposed of the body. The account is therefore plainly contradictory which says that the Roman authorities gave him up to the Jews to crucify him, and then proceeds to relate his crucifixion at the hands of the Romans.

A crucifixion by the Romans, however, is as improbable under the circumstances as one by the Jews. Not only was Jesus found innocent by the authorities, but he was not even charged with an offense for which he could have been crucified if he had been found guilty. Under the Romans no accusation of heresy, blasphemy, or false assumption of a prophetic or divine character was a capital offense (see Neander, Life of Christ, §284). Much less would he have been condemned or handed over to others to be crucified if these offenses had been committed against a different religion from that of the Romans and in violation of a different law from theirs. And yet Christ is represented in the Gospels as having been handed over by Pilate to the Jews to be crucified under their laws for an offense trivial to the Romans, and which, as we have seen, was not punishable with death even under the Jewish laws.

In the next place, crucifixion was not the appropriate punishment for Christ even if he had been condemned to death. This punishment was reserved for slaves and the very lowest criminals. No Roman citizen could be crucified, or even a freeborn person, except one of very low condition. By the jus civitatis exemption from crucifixion was declared to be the privilege of every Roman. Only for the greatest crimes, moreover, could one be crucified at all, as robbery, piracy, and assassination. It was illegal and unprecedented to deliver such a man as Jesus to the cross, or to deliver anyone to it for such an offense as that charged against him.

Nor, let us here remark, could Jesus have been legally crucified under Jewish law for the offense charged, even if he had been found guilty and condemned to death. Crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment. It was, according to many writers, unknown among the ancient Jews. The author of Rabbi Jeshua says that only four capital punishments were recognized by Jewish law—stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. The latter was not a crucifixion, and, besides, it was very rarely employed. By this method the victim was seized by the throat by two men, who sometimes put a lighted taper in his mouth. There was, indeed, occasionally what they called a crucifixion of the dead body, but it was inflicted only after death, and consisted in tying the body to a stake. This was done when one had been stoned to death. The same writer says: "As a rebellious elder or a false prophet Jesus might have been put to death by strangling; as a blasphemer he should have been stoned" (Rabbi Jeshua, page 146).

Many incidental circumstances connected with the trial and crucifixion are related by the Evangelists which could not have occurred unless the proceedings were grossly illegal, so palpably illegal that it is hardly credible that any court, or high officer, would permit or sanction them.

The first of these was the scourging of Christ. This could not have been legally done before he was condemned. He should, according to law, have been first sentenced, then scourged, and then executed. And yet John says that he was first scourged, and afterward questioned and condemned.

The placing of a scarlet robe and crown of thorns on him was also illegal, as were the physical indignities offered, such as beating and spitting upon him, especially before his conviction, as related by John. The Romans protected their prisoners from popular insults at trial, and even after conviction. That so many proprieties, as well as laws, should be totally disregarded in Christ's case seems highly incredible.

It was also illegal to compel Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross of Jesus. Simon was a chance-comer (according to the three first gospels) whom they accidentally met as they led out Jesus; and to take a man wholly unconnected with the case and, without process of law, make him undergo this indignity was contrary to all precedent. The custom was to make the condemned carry the cross, or a part of it, as John says Jesus did: for John's account differs from the others, saying: "He went out bearing the cross for himself."

The inscription written by Pilate and placed on the cross was hardly according to law. The inscription on most crosses declared the crime for which the prisoner died. Pilate, however, wrote simply: "This is Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews," which does not give any intimation of his offense, unless indeed by remote implication.

The early removal of Jesus from the cross was also contrary to law, or at least to general custom. The body was usually allowed to hang on the cross until it decomposed, or was devoured by birds. A guard was commonly placed over it to prevent its removal. In this case, however, according to the Gospels, it was taken down and buried immediately after death.

It will thus be seen that the trial and crucifixion of Christ, as related by the Evangelists (leaving out the contradictions, or apparent contradictions, in the different Gospels), were, in many respects, grossly contrary to law, and against the customs of the people, whether Jews or Romans, who are alleged to have conducted them. The whole story is an anomaly and, to legal minds, almost incredible.

There are several other circumstances related by the Evangelists in connection with the crucifixion that are highly improbable, and go to discredit the whole story.

It is hard to believe that a people who had just given Christ a triumph, could so soon change about as to demand his death. Only a few days before, in the same Jerusalem, the populace welcomed him with songs and palm branches, and threw their garments at his feet, crying, "Hozannah! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord;" and now this populace is represented as crying with equal enthusiasm, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Pilate himself is represented, with great inconsistency, as so afraid of Christ's popularity that he had to crucify him to suppress it, and so afraid of his unpopularity that he had to crucify him to please the people.

It is hard to believe, also, that when Christ was so popular that his enemies could not arrest him on a feast-day lest the people should make an uproar, but had to take him by stealth, through betrayal—it is hard to believe, we say, that such a popular person would be so demanded by the populace for crucifixion that the governor did not dare to spare his life. Why was it necessary that Christ should be betrayed, in order to be tried and executed, when the people wanted him to die? The service of Judas was wholly unnecessary, and could not, in those Jewish eyes, have been worth thirty pieces of silver.

Another difficulty in the way of accepting the story of the crucifixion is that no place can be found about Jerusalem to correspond to Calvary, where the crucifixion is alleged to have occurred, or to Gethsemane, the scene of Christ's previous sufferings. The traditional site of Golgotha, at least, could not, in view of all the circumstances, have been the place of crucifixion. If Christ was crucified at all the place has been lost to mankind, and it would almost seem that the scene was laid in aftertimes by persons at a distance from Jerusalem, who were not acquainted with the surroundings.

Another small matter of improbability is that Jesus should decline to drink the anodyne which was given to ease his pain. This was an acid wine mingled with myrrh, and was commonly given to sufferers on the cross out of pity. It is said that when he tasted of it he would not drink. It seems improbable, we say, that he should thus refuse to quiet his pain, especially as he was so soon after to ask for a draught to quench his thirst. The fact, moreover, that such a quieting draught was offered him seems strangely inconsistent with the inhumanity of the rest of the transaction, in which, according to the gospels, the crucifiers tried by insults and outrage to aggravate his sufferings rather than to mitigate them, and with the charge that the drink offered was "vinegar mingled with gall."

A more serious difficulty in the way of accepting the story of Christ's crucifixion is that his death is alleged to have occurred after six hours. His death could not, under such circumstances, have been the result of crucifixion. The time was too short. It usually required from two to three days to die on the cross. Crucifixion affected directly no vital organ, and was a lingering death. In some instances the crucified have lingered a week, and examples are given by several writers of persons who have been restored to health after hanging on the cross several days. It would seem from this circumstance alone, either that the whole story of the crucifixion is false, or that Christ, if crucified, never died from it. We are told that his disciples were charged with stealing his body from the grave. It is more likely, according to the natural theory, that they stole his body from the cross before he was dead and resuscitated him.

A last objection to receiving the story of Christ's crucifixion is that, after this event, he is alleged to have been seen alive, and by many persons at different times. As the unbeliever rejects the story of the resurrection, he must conclude, if Christ was subsequently seen, either that he was taken from the cross alive, as just intimated, or that the crucifixion never took place at all. In either event Christ was not crucified "according to the Gospel."

In view of all the difficulties named—historical, legal, and scientific—the question becomes a serious one whether Jesus was actually crucified. It is not a question merely of whether all the details as related are true, but whether the main fact occurred. For it is the essentials of the story that are most doubtful, and not the details. The transaction as a whole is involved in so many great improbabilities that those who do not accept the Scriptures as inspired cannot find sufficient evidence to establish it at all. It must, in their view, seem more probable that those who got up the miracles of Christ got up the story of his crucifixion, and that they were both the invention of a subsequent age (which for the purposes of propagating a religion required a dramatic and pathetic death quite as much as miracles). The startling extremes of goodness and badness, the keeping of them in constant juxtaposition through the whole transaction, and the crowding of so many dramatic incidents in one short space, could only be the work of a master imagination. The treachery by such a bad Judas of such a good Jesus, the betrayal by the most affectionate sign—a kiss—the forsaking by all his disciples of so faithful a friend, the denial by Peter on the heels of his protest, "Though all deny thee yet will not I," the corruption of all the judges, the perjury of all the witnesses, the hypocritical maladministration of Pilate and Herod, the choice by the people of Barabbas, a robber, in preference to Jesus Christ, the craziness of the mob and cruelty of the soldiers to such a tender nature as Christ's, the placing of the spotless Jesus between two thieves, the plea by the dying thief for remembrance (together with the instant promise by Christ of Paradise to him), and finally the piteous cries of agony mingled with the prayer for his crucifiers, constitute the greatest chain of dramatic situations found in either history or fiction, and such a whole as could not have actually occurred. All this, too, must be taken in connection with the fact that it is related with miraculous circumstances—the darkening of the sun and the resurrection of the dead—and that it follows in a life composed largely of miracles.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Oh, dear! oh, dear! It often puzzles me where people keep their brains. Maybe they are preserved in their heads, but oftentimes I fancy they leave them at home on their pianos, or somewhere. Last Saturday I journeyed into Bedfordshire to address a quiet little provincial town, of some thirty thousand inhabitants, on the Sunday. A few months before the whole town was disturbed to the uttermost by a similar visit. This time, stir there was none. Walking through the streets on the previous evening, many good people recognized me, and now and again I was asked whether I intended to speak there on the morrow. To my surprise and sorrow, neither my questioners nor the townsfolk generally knew anything of the proposed lectures; and I soon learned that only a paltry five hundred handbills had been partially distributed in an unobtrusiv manner. My suggestion that I should speak in the morning in the open air and let folks know, was deemed to be ill advised; the consequence being that, in the morning, I had four people who came of whom but one remained; in the afternoon, quite a dozen came out, and in the evening there were at least thirty. What a falling off from the fine July audiences, varying from five hundred to a thousand, to whom I preached Secularism in the heart of their town! And how consoling to the lecturer to find that people who would gladly hav turned up stayed away through sheer ignorance of what was going on! Of course, the fault lies with leaving men who can not afford to be "too prominent" in our unpopular cause to jockey our efforts in out-of-the-way places. What the National Secular Society most needs now to giv emphasis to the work it has already done, is a small college of evangelists (to use an ecclesiastical phrase which will be better understood by Americans than by English Freethinkers), who will be allowed funds to hire a hall and pay printing bills and to act, so far as overt action is concerned, independently, letting those who wish join in the work and identify themselvs with it; but I am getting tired of being pressed to start work in a place subject to numerous injudicious arrangements, with the half-certainty of finding a variety of interesting reasons why the promoters should take a back seat when the fray begins. One can scarcely expect to find the converts rush to the front when their leaders tarry behind. Any man who undertakes to raise the Freethought banner in his village, town, or city should count up the cost first; and then, if he decides to unfurl the flag, he should pledge himself to carry the business through. It is because men are not frequently brave enough to do this, and in a financial position to bear the strain, that I am so anxious to see a body of men with roving commissions to stir up the people, and so let old Freethinkers see beforehand the chances of success if they throw themselvs into the work. It is the old, old story. We require all the tact and disciplin of a military army combined with the religious fervor of the superstitious; then could we make Liberalism, as you call it, or Secularism, as we call it, progress in our countries by leaps and bounds. During the past year Secularism has thus moved in England; but it is still hampered by being officered locally by illiterate and inexperienced captains. This progressiv movement should be our pastime, and if people really want Freethought to do its work properly, the more educated and refined ought to come to the front.

They say straws best show which way the wind blows. Perhaps they do; anyhow, there cannot be much mistake about the tendency of a new book, which I hav not seen, but which is revised in this week's number of the Church Times. The Rev. W. O. Newnham, in his "Alresford Essays for the Times," has come to the conclusion that "the nineteenth century requires a resetting of the jewels of the Catholic faith." Well, if truth is everlasting and the Catholic faith be the truth "which except a man keep whole and undefiled, he cannot be saved," and for the non-belief in which he "shall perish everlastingly," then the Catholic faith can need no resetting whatever; and so our author begs the question of truth right away. And how does he propose to reset this faith—we dare not say "truth" in the face of such an admission? He informs us that Adam and Eve were not newly created beings, but individuals chosen from a pre-Adamite race, and located among circumstances favorable to the breeding-up of a higher race of manhood than had as yet appeared. And this is how the author translates Gen. ii, 21: "And God caused an ectasy to fall upon Adam and he slept. And God took one of his female relativs and purified the fleshly appetites under her power." Very convincing, is it not?

Mr. Bradlaugh was inclined to believe, and many of us agreed with him, that some day the Christians and Atheists would hav to fight a sort of pitched battle, when Christians of all sorts would league together, and when they would let loose all their pent-up fanaticism, calling in any and every aid to destroy unbelievers from the face of the earth. In that day the truer Christians would amalgamate with Rome and assimilate their faith; the broader Christians would assimilate with us and fight under our banner. Then would come the crash and perhaps the most terrific religious struggle this world has ever seen. Some of our people do not believe in this. However, I can not help seeing the coming struggle clearly mapped out in things around us. Quite recently I referred in one of these letters to the infatuation of many Protestants for copying Catholic details in church arrangements. This week I was forcibly struck with a design for the new Whitefield Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, London. It is modeled on your American notion of what a church should be like, and is hopelessly foreign to anything known in ecclesiastical art of the ancient churches. The interior is amphitheatrical, with the platform-pulpit as the cynosure of all eyes; and in addition there is a church-parlor and every other available worldly convenience.

There is nothing to find fault with in the arrangements, per se; the remarkable part of it is that some Christians, and not a few nowadays, are beginning to build their churches in such a way that when the old faith has clean died out they will still be available, without alterations, for use as lecture-halls or concert-rooms. Did Christians fully believe in the continuance of the Christian faith, I scarcely think they would anticipate so very secular a future.

There is nothing very exciting to report this week in our Freethought circles. Perhaps that is as well, for they say, "No news is good news." Revivals and excitements are all very good in their way; but it is the steady, plodding work of old hands that tells in the end. Of course Christians are good enough to tell us that this even tenor of our ways is a sure sign of decay, and that the thoughtful and respectable refuse to become members of so wretched a fraud as the National Secular Society. Maybe that is true; on the other hand, it is delightful to know that they get there all the same, and that we are growing stronger day by day.

I heard a pretty good story after my lecture last Sunday. A friend at Luton, it seems, was busy walking along the street and distributing back numbers of the Freethinker as he walked. One recipient was thunderstruck by his gift, and held it at arm's length from him, saying in tones of surprise, "The Freethinker, by Christ!" "No," said the distributor, "by G. W. Foote." All being well I shall be giving Luton another look-up on Sunday, and shall then see how the movement is progressing there. A few months ago I was stoned, hooted, and bonneted by the Christian roughs of that town; maybe more awaits me.

SAM STANDRING.

The Freethought Society and Its Demands.

To help maintain the religious liberties of men and women in America, a compactly organized society, having a few, and only a few, clearly stated and definit demands, is needed.

This society should strive for,

First, the total separation of church and state.

Second, the abrogation of all Sunday laws, no matter upon what pretext enacted.

Third, the "unqualified non-censorship of the public press;" and,

Fourth, the unrestricted right of peaceable public assembly.

These demands will furnish us with plenty of work; they are few, but they cover all the ground that we, as organized Freethinkers, can profitably occupy, and they can be readily understood by all whose adherence would be of any value to us.

Mr. Henry Frank has animadverted at some length upon this subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 26th. His first three demands include all of the above except the Fourth. Of his other demands the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh contain nothing not expressed or implied in the first three, being simply amplifications and dilutions of those clear-cut formulations, greatly weakening the platform as a whole, as all redundant conditions inevitably do.

His Eighth demand is a puzzle, attempting, as it does, to discriminate between what is prejudicial to the working classes and what is unjustly prejudicial.

His Ninth and Tenth demands contemplate work which may be done by individual Freethinkers, by Freethought papers and magazines, and by Freethought educational and fraternal societies. But the fighting executiv of a Secular organization whose battle is for the obtainment and maintenance of equal religious and civil liberties for its members and others has neither time, means, nor strength to fritter away upon such schemes. All of us hav plenty to do outside of a Freethought organization, and there is no lack of channels through which we can reach the people, no matter what position we take upon social and economic questions. The National Secular Society of our English co-workers is, in many respects, a good model for us. It possesses the great merits of concentration, definitness, and pertinacity, qualities sadly lacking in most of our organizations, as well as in the American character. The English Freethinkers, who constitute the Secular Society, hav confined their labors to the task of securing and defending the liberty of speech, press, and public meeting. We must do likewise if we would win a small portion even of the success which they hav achieved.

Mr. Frank's Eleventh demand is wholly superfluous in such a society as we need, and as we should hav were we to organize upon the three vital and fundamental principles which Mr. Frank first enumerates, and the additional and equally vital and fundamental principle of the right of undisturbed public meeting. We need to bend our combined energies to the work of establishing Free Thought, Free Speech, and Free Action upon a firm and enduring basis. These are now attacked by the church and her ally, the state, at three points, where we must stand united and unyielding or lose the modicum of liberty that we hav been permitted to retain. We must stay and ultimately roll back the tide of invasiv Sunday fanaticism; we must resist the encroachments and destroy the power of the Comstocks, and we must insist upon the right and necessity of unchallenged and uninvaded assembly. These are the essentials for us as Freethinkers, as organized Freethinkers.

At present the Adventists are doing much more than we are for Secularization. I am glad that the work is being done, but am sorry that unfortunate counsels hav for years paralyzed our activities. It is encouraging to know that the new president of the Secular Union is in favor of retracing some of the foolish steps taken since the countermarch was begun at Cassadaga. Judge Waite is wholly and emphatically right when he says that our demand should be simply and strongly "the repeal of all laws enjoining the observance of Sunday." Weak, pueril, and invasion-inviting is the post-Cassadaga deliverance—"the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons." Why, that is a Trojan horse in which could be smuggled into our citadel all the Shepards, Craftses, and Sunday Observance Leagues in the Union.

Now, will Judge Waite giv forth an equally uncertain sound in regard to the postal statutes, which strike a deadly blow at all that Freethinkers hold dear, and concerning which the Liberal League became suddenly dumb at the Cassadaga Congress? Is the League-Union at last ashamed of its seven years' tumultuous and unbroken retreat from its most implacable and dangerous enemies? Is it prepared to cease trailing its guns and to turn squarely about and once more look Comstockism unflinchingly in the face? It has tried the experiment of gaining strength and prestige by running away from its logical and hereditary foe, gag-law. The ludicrous fiasco of Philadelphia has, I should think, satisfied the most enthusiastic champion of the policy of silence of the barrenness of the experiment. E. C. WALKER.

News and Notes.

It was raining heavily when I left Marysville for Colusa, across country by stage thirty miles, at 6 o'clock in the morning. It was dark as midnight almost. We take the ferry at Feather river, which rolls quite tumultuously along. On the other side is Yuba City. Marysville is county seat of Yuba county, and Yuba City county seat of Sutter county —two different county seats almost looking at each other from opposit banks, a somewhat remarkable coincidence. Plashing through Yuba City and stretching over the level plain, while the sun is faintly rising and beaming, we reach Sutter City, ten miles away. Around Sutter City is one of the finest farming countries in the world. We pass on amidst increasing wind and rain, to Meridian City, another ten miles. The storm is at its hight at this place. After passing Meridian the clouds roll off, streaks of sunshine glitter, and the beautiful Marysville buttes are seen in lovely outline through the breaking mists. When we drive into Colusa the blue is over our heads, and the afternoon is radiant.

I find Colusa, however, under the clouds of orthodoxy. Somehow or other the people of this place seem to be afraid to think, or afraid to say that they think. I had a fair audience on Saturday evening, but not much Sunday afternoon and evening. However, I persevered, hoping for better times one of these days. There is a fine Liberal spirit among a few at Colusa, and under more favorable auspices there might be a successful work carried on. Of course, we cannot always expect victory. The fates will sometimes be upon the other side; not because the other side is so strong, but because of the enormous mass of indifference that somehow cannot be made to hav any thrill of life. The churches flourish on this indifference. It is their pasture-ground and main support.

Some stir has been made, however. There has been a discussion of Infidelity and evolution, and an attack on these is better than nothing; and in their attacks the clergy are forced to giv expression to some Liberal ideas.

I hav met stanch comrades here, and if I hav struck the picket line, the fires hav burnt, and there has been no cessation of cheer.

Judge John H. Leining is one of those who never givs up the fight. He has been a pioneer for over fifty years. He acted as chairman of our meetings and ably introduced the subject of the lectures and made my own efforts much more effectiv. It was like martial music to the soldier. My old fellow-officer in arms, Mr. I. G. Gardner, is with me in this vaster conflict, a Liberal to his heart's core and ready for the call. R. Blackburn, A. J. Hankins, and C. C. Hickok are cordial allies. Mr. R. Poirier, of the Colusa Hotel, is a landlord after my own heart, who givs the traveler a warm welcome. There is plenty of sociable life mixed with sterner realities. I hav not a dull moment. All the toil is made pleasant with remembrance of the past, with anticipation of the future. Monday was a day of marvelous beauty. The sunshine was perfectly golden. The sky was of a wondrous blue. How the landscape shone in the brilliant mingling of blue and gold! The great mountains seemed like jewels, gems of a bridal day—the marriage of earth to heaven. The wide plains were like a shining sea, and even the railroad appeared a silver ribbon in the luxuriant splendor. I speed through the summer's sunshine, and the red chambers of sunset, and the starlighted halls of twilight, and the moonlighted palace of early night, on to the flashing lamps of San Francisco, shattered into a million diamonds in the magnificent bay, on to the billowy and crested hills adorned with a thousand homes.

Well, a hard month's work is before me, but I find friends ready to join heart and hand. We are going to do our level best. Even if we hav been defeated, we do not propose to giv up. We shall hav a series of lectures in San Francisco the coming month of January, on the "Evolutions of a Century"—theological, religious, philosophical, scientific, social, industrial, and political. We shall hav a grand Paine celebration on January 29th. This will, undoubtedly, be the best we hav ever had on the Pacific coast. Our state convention promises to be of great importance. It is absolutely necessary for the advancement of Liberalism that state organizations be formed at once. From the Atlantic to the Pacific there should be a cordon of these state organizations, absolutely independent in themselvs, but working harmoniously together. Washington, Oregon, California, and Texas hav formed these organizations. Ohio is sweeping into line. Let us hav state organizations. Every state has its own separate issues, its independent work to do, and unless there are state organizations these issues will not be met, the work will not be done. Robert C. Adams, president of the Canadian Secular Union, suggests state organization as the remedy for existing difficulties. He is right. State organizations to the front. Through state organizations will come coöperations and national advancement. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

San Francisco, Dec. 25, 1891.

On to California.

I gave three lectures at North Bend, Neb., to large audiences, and made an earnest effort to get subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator, and although I was introduced to perhaps twenty different persons called Liberals, none of them could be persuaded to take either of these two grand Freethought papers. I could account for it only on the grounds of scarcity of money and the scarcity of thinking people.

A former member of the Salvation Army made a very fanatical attack upon me in a store, informing me that I was doing great harm in talking against the Bible, and moreover that I was no gentleman or I would not be engaged in such indecent work. I asked him, after his effervescence was over, if he prayed, and he assured me with great fervor that he did. I made the further inquiry whether he thought that his prayers were answered, and he was confident that they were. Then I suggested to him that he had never asked God for the blessing of common sense, or if he had that somehow God had neglected him.

This created a great laugh at his expense. Unfortunately the laugh did not do him any good. He still wanders about talking and thinking that he has lots of common sense. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. J. P. Jackson and wife. And notwithstanding my failure to get subscribers, I predict for North Bend a future in the cause of Freethought. Brother Jackson is a fearless and tireless worker, and I am sure he will push some of the half-and-half sort off the fence, and see to it that they drop on the right side.

At Friend, Neb., we hav but few straight-out Freethinkers. Mr. J. W. Gilbert is a whole-souled Freethinker and a fearless debater.

I gave only one lecture, but had the satisfaction of talking to a large audience, which was quite a surprise to me as well as to Mr. Gilbert and others.

I enjoyed the home comforts of Mr. Andrew Nelson and wife. The pilgrim lecturer who is taken care of by them will long and gratefully remember their kind ministrations.

After leaving Friend, Neb., I had a long ride to Kansas City, and after visiting a brother there I took a much longer ride to Dallas, Tex., where I gave two lectures. The first night the audience was large and greatly interested, but on the second night the numbers were less. Evidently some of the people did not like the tone of my voice. I was not surprised, for there is a vast amount of whangdoodle preaching in this country. The ministers whine and sniffle, and tell stories about being "prepared to meet God." The least bit of levity at the expense of religion passes for blasphemy.

Mr. Wm. Bondies and his brother, Geo. T. Bondies, are the activ workers. I did not hav any ladies to hear me at either lecture. They hav some very strange ideas in this country of what a woman may do and what she may not do.

From Forney I took another long but very pleasant ride to Flatonia, Tex., where I flung the flag of freedom to the breeze for one night. The audience was much larger than was expected, and although several next day congratulated me upon my success and the great satisfaction my lecture gave, and gleefully repeated some of my humorous illustrations, yet during the delivery of the lecture everybody, or almost everybody, was serious if not solemn.

I found some activ Liberals here, but they share the common calamity of hard times and could not subscribe for any papers. J. H. Sloma, Dr. B. W. Briston, H. W. Yeager, J. E. Faires, and T. E. Tanner are all earnest Freethinkers, and would contribute liberally to Freethought interests if times were better.

At San Antonio I gave three lectures, but the times were out of joint. Bad weather and disagreement among the Liberals prevented me from having large audiences. There are many Freethinkers in this old Mexican city, but they are not working at the business. This is a Catholic town and should breed Freethinkers on that account, and I hav no doubt that it does, but too many of this class are indifferent and do not read Liberal literature. I made an appeal at each lecture for subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but in vain. However, this field has been pretty well canvassed by Dr. York and Mr. Locke. A soft rain is now falling and the weather is as warm as May weather in New York.

W. S. BELL.

My Lecture Trip.

I left Ottumwa in good spirits, having had two very successful meetings, which eclipsed all previous records, and reached Chicago on Wednesday, the 16th inst. I spent a few days here at the home of my old friend E. A. Stevens, and was pleased indeed to find him in such favorable circumstances. All traces of Mrs. Stevens's late indisposition had disappeared, good health now reigned supreme, and so the few days I spent with them were devoted to sight-seeing and pleasure-seeking. The streets of Chicago were crowded with holiday-makers, a good-natured, good-humored, though a somewhat eager, crushing throng. The stores were all decorated with flags and bunting; some with representations of Santa Claus, which bring joy to the heart of every child. In our infancy we are taught to look upon Santa Claus as a reality; we believe him to be such; the infant mind, so susceptible to fairy tales of wonder, has eagerly grasped and clutched at the stories of the nursery, and has regarded these personifications of ideas as real and tangible beings; and then what must hav been the bitter anguish to find out, as they grew up, that they hav been worshiping but a phantom, a dream of the imagination. And as with children, so it is with men in the infancy of their civilization—the human mind loved to personify ideas: Good, Evil, Death, Justice, War, Beauty, and Love hav all been personified in one way or another, so as to convey to the human mind some tangible idea of the subject represented; and one can easily imagin the pangs that strike deep into the human heart when it finds that these paradise apples of superstition hav turned to ashes in their mouth.

Thus it has ever been with all the Gods ever worshiped, which are nothing more nor less than huge Santa Clauses set up for the supposed edification of the human mind; but, having been invested with certain attributes and passions, a fac-simile of their authors, they hav, instead of edifying, degraded mankind by dominating them and placing them in subjugation. Happily, however, the age of the Gods is passing away. Men are learning, though many of them in secresy and stealth, to break their mental fetters, and erelong our posterity will be able to gaze back with astonishment at this hideous nightmare which has appalled and oppressed so many of their ancestors. The world, however, is yet in its youth. Gods and devils hav been the playthings of its childhood, a theological Santa Claus or Jack-in-the-box set up for the amusement, and above all the profit, of those knowing babies in surplices, gowns, and lawn sleeves. But the world is advancing. The Gods, like the devils, must go. Light is breaking in upon the horizon of theology. The night has been long and terrible, in which centuries may stand for hours; but now the warm and ruddy tints of a coming day are perceptible. Already its dawn may be seen rising over the hills of progress, and vain will be the efforts of ignorance and self-interest to stay it in its onward course.

Chicago is now in her holiday attire; everything and everyone appear at their best; every face seems radiant with smiles, eyes that flash forth sparkling with joy; merry, rippling laughter is heard on every side; the whole of Nature and Nature's children seem happy, joyous, and gay. And yet, how many are there in our land at this very day who with heavy hearts, burdened with care, are perhaps cursing their very existence—who could not be made glad by all the fairy tales of Yule-tide! 'Tis now eighteen centuries since the God incarnate came to save the world—a mission yet unfulfilled—and now at this time, the anniversary of his supposed advent on earth, one can ask, and with sufficient reasons to justify the inquiry, Though the savior has come, whence comes salvation? I met once again our old Freethought friends in Chicago, Mr. Robertson and family, J. O'Neil and family, and Mr. Harris and family. Everything was done by them to make my stay in Chicago as pleasant as possible, and I was very loath indeed to leave them. Duty calls, however, and I must go; so, taking a fond farewell of friend Stevens and family, I started again on my journey, this time for Strasburg, Ill., where I was engaged for two lectures. I was met at the depot by Dr. A. York, a well-known worker in the ranks of Freethought, and one who needs no commentary from me; for, as actions speak louder than words, by his deeds ye shall know him.

I was glad to meet here with such stanch and earnest Freethinkers as Mr. and Mrs. H. Bernhard, Dr. and Mrs. A. York, Amos Hanholtzer, J. A. Storms, and Harman Rauch.

Strasburg has only a population of three hundred, but it is well known as a good Liberal town; and, comparing its enterprises with its inhabitants, agricultural and otherwise, it seems to be a prosperous little town. My lectures were given very successfully indeed. For my own part, I was thoroughly satisfied with the general results thereof, although they did not quite approach the expectations of our Strasburg friends. My first lecture was attended by a good crowd, earnest and attentiv in the extreme, but on the second night a slight falling off in the attendance was perceptible, owing, no doubt, in a great measure to its being Christmas eve, and other attractions being held out to the inhabitants. For instance, the Methodist church gave an oyster supper, the Baptist church gave a prayer-meeting (there can be no doubt as to which was the more substantial entertainment of the two), and again some local musicians had arranged a dance, whereat the festivities ran high and long. Our meeting, however, was made very attractiv by instrumental and vocal music, furnished by Misses Pearl York, Minnie Simmers, and Lizzie Whitlatch. The compositions rendered were selected from the "Cosmian Hymn Book," and were well received by the audience. This should be encouraged at all our meetings. Dr. York has established here a lecture bureau, something that is needed in every town. He has by this means always funds at his disposal, so that when a Liberal lecturer writes asking for an appointment he can invariably write back telling him to come on. Each Freethinker in the town contributes his share, and if anything is made over and above the expenses the surplus is held until the next visit of a lecturer. This is certainly a good scheme and would work well in those towns where a society could not be maintained, and one that should be imitated wherever possible.

While in Strasburg I was the honored guest of H. Bernhard and wife at their magnificent home on the outskirts of this little town. Everything was done by them to add to my comfort, for which I tender to them my heartfelt gratitude. 'Tis Christmas day, Dr. and Mrs. York hav joined our throng, and we all sit down to a sumptuous feast in honor of the occasion. The viands disappeared with astonishing rapidity. The turkey we had may perhaps never gobble again in this world, but I can assure you that we gobbled him in a way that was certainly surprising.

On Christmas eve I went, in company with the younger members of the Bernhard family, after my lecture, to the dance previously mentioned. It was indeed a crude and curious sight that met my gaze upon entering the room. It was held in a large and empty store. There, seated upon a counter, were two youths, each with a violin, furiously scraping the bow across the strings in a mad attempt to keep time with the dancers. The dancers keeping time with the orchestra was out of the question. The strains that floated on the air sounded to me something like the old familiar air of "Pop Goes the Weasel." I stayed and watched two or three dances. They were alike; each time the "orchestra" (no offense, I hope) played the same old air, with the time modified a little so as to make it fit in. We did not stay here long. A few minutes sufficed, and so we wended our way homeward. We had been in the house but a short time when we were charmed by a melody from without which, floating on the breeze, wafted to our ears strains that sounded like celestial music. Listening attentivly we were enraptured by the beautiful chorus of "Whip-poor-will" from a party of serenaders, a blended chorus of male and female voices.

The serenaders were invited into the house and a very pleasant evening was spent by all. Everyone thoroughly enjoyed themselvs, until the morning hours were well advanced and the party broke up. We retired that night to dream only of little fairies, and huge turkey gobblers seeking revenge.

The next day I went on again to Centralia, to giv two more lectures. The weather is beautiful, and is undoubtedly the mildest I hav yet witnessed at this season of the year. One has to look at the calender, almost, to find out whether this is really Christmas time or the Fourth of July. There are no signs of winter here, no snows, but all around are a radiant sunshine and the fresh stir of healthful life.

I arrived at Centralia Saturday night and was soon located in a comfortable room at the Centralia Hotel, kept by F. D. Rexford, an earnest and Radical thinker. He gave me a cordial welcome and told me to make myself thoroughly at home, an injunction which I obeyed to the letter. I was pleased also to meet with such Freethinkers as Dr. Munsell, Dave Robertson, and "Bob" Dwyer. The latter, having been strictly raised a Roman Catholic, has developed into a Freethinker, and is now just as earnest and sincere in the fight for mental liberty as he was formerly an adherent to the Catholic hierarchy, a strange characteristic of all Roman converts to Freethought. My first lecture here was met with a very good attendance, considering the size of the place, and above all the terrible influence of the church over a large portion of its inhabitants. It is a strictly orthodox, church-ridden, priest-cursed town, this marking it as a good field for Liberal work. Here, as elsewhere, I found but a few who were willing to bear the brunt of the battle, the greater portion exhibiting a timid fear of that social ostracism should they be identified with our movement. It is indeed a sad thing that all men do not recognize that "truth" should be written across the horizon of the universe, so that all men might become partakers thereof, and not be whispered in secret confab over the counter in some store. And here let me say: Honor, then, to those who hav the courage to speak out now, for it is only by plain and honest speech upon these questions that liberty of speech can be won, and each who will speak out now makes liberty of speech easier for those that follow. Let us not be influenced by any dread of our exciting the delicate senses of our opponents, for while we can respect their honest feelings, still it must not be forgotten that we can effect no compromise with them. My first lecture was well received; the local press gave a detailed report of the same, extending over nearly a column, for which I publicly thanked the editor for thus fearlessly braving public sentiment in this orthodox town, by giving publicity under such circumstances to the "other side." My next lecture was attended with better results than ever; the hall was filled this time, and there were quite a number of ladies present. F. D. Rexford introduced me to the audience upon each occasion, and made quite a capable chairman. Although I had challenged the clerical fraternity to come and discuss the subject with me, they, perhaps very wisely, refrained from putting in an appearance, notwithstanding that the editor of the local daily had given publicity to and commented upon my challenge. Everyone seemed well pleased with my lectures and I had to assure them that I would visit them again at the earliest opportunity. A debate has been partially arranged between myself and the Rev. Mr. Spanhower, a preacher of the Baptist persuasion in Strasburg; if the debate does take place (there is nothing absolutely certain about it yet) it will occur some time about next June, and is to extend over a period of four nights. All that I hav to say is, that if the reverend gentleman can agree with me as to terms and propositions, then "Barkis is willing."

I hav still a few week-nights open for lectures upon my homeward journey, and friends desiring my services to lecture may address me in care of W. S. Moke, Massillon, O.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Special Announcement.

The meeting for some time advertised, to inaugurate a movement looking to free thought, free religion, and social reform, under the management of Henry Frank, will be held on Sunday, January 10th, at Hardman Hall, Fifth avenue and Nineteenth street. Tickets for admission, free of charge, may be obtained at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, Twentieth Century office, Hardman Hall office, Nineteenth street, and by mail. Those having tickets will be first admitted; those without tickets will be admitted at ten minutes to 8. Mr. Frank will address the audience on "The Need of the Hour." An effort will be made to organize the movement.

INVITATION TO ATTEND A MEETING AT HARDMAN HALL TO INAUGURATE A MOVEMENT UNDER HENRY FRANK.

There is a movement on foot to secure the services of Henry Frank for a Sunday Liberal lectureship in New York city. To those of us who are acquainted with the history and ability of Mr. Frank, he appeals as peculiarly the very man who can utilize the present opportunity and develop a permanent organization of strength, culture, and usefulness. He has been a clergyman, but has long since outgrown ancient superstitions and religious puerilities. While his methods are aggressiv, he seeks to win all. He is no mere iconoclast or critic, but a reconstructionist and reorganizer. It would be his effort to develop a field of educational and reformatory labor among the masses which would appeal to Liberals and humanitarians of every grade and name. In his meetings, Universalists, Unitarians, Agnostics, Progressiv Hebrews, Free Religionists, Materialists, Spiritualists, Theosophists, and Liberal Christians of every phase would find a cordial welcome, as well as all workers along lines of economic reform. Mr. Frank believes in seeking the common ground of harmony which exists between the various schools of economic thought from the most conservativ to the most radical.

Why cannot such a movement succeed? Mr. Pentecost has retired from the platform and left a multitude of Liberal people without a Sunday rendezvous. The ethical culturists while doing a noble work are apparently narrowing their freedom of thought within certain self-assumed philosophical restrictions. Mr. Frothingham's distinguished and cultured audiences hav never again united.

Mr. Frank has the ability, the experience, the culture, the courage, and the eloquence to carry forward such a movement. All he needs is the encouragement of supporters to undertake the work. He has expressed his willingness to do so, if we can demonstrate sufficient enthusiasm and interest.

We hav therefore published this call and are mailing it to as many Liberals of all schools as we can reach. We urgently invite you to meet with us at Hardman Hall, Fifth avenue and 19th street, on Sunday, January 10th, at 8 o'clock P.M. (entrance on 19th street), where we look for a large audience, to hear an address from Mr. Frank, explanatory of the purpose and plan of the proposed society, and to discuss measures whereby the work may be carried on. Do not fail to be present and hear Mr. Frank's address. His subject will be, "The Need of the Hour."

Lectures and Meetings.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S present lecture appointments are as follows: January 10th, Columbus, O.; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

W. S. BELL lectures on his homeward trip to California, at El Paso, Tex., Phœnix and Tempe, Ariz., and San Pasqual, Santa Ana, Los Angeles, Monrovia, Porterville, and Hornitos, Cal.

MANHATTAN LIBERAL CLUB meets every Friday evening at 8 o'clock in German Masonic Hall, No. 220 East 15th street, New York: January 8th—Vegetable Food as a Means to Higher Development, Mrs. C. LeFavre; January 15th—The Study of Applied Sociology, Dr. R. G. Eccles; January 22d—Theosophy, W. Q. Judge; January 29th—Thomas Paine (anniversary address), Moncure D Conway.

THE Ohio Liberal Society, of Cincinnati, has leased the well-known and commodious hall known as the Douglass Hall, N.W. Cor. Sixth and Walnut, and will occupy it for regular Sunday evening meetings. The exercises at these meetings will consist of a lecture, occupying about one hour, followed by criticism and discussion. The following are the lecturers and their subjects for the remainder of January: January 10th—J. L. Cuppin, "Roman Catholicism;" January 17th—C. P. Spaulding, "Evolution and Progression;" January 24th—George Collins, "Buddha and Christ," with readings from Buddhist scriptures; January 31st—Prof. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas City, Mo., "The Sunday Question."

THE Freethinkers of Portage county, O., will hold a series of meetings in honor of Thos. Paine at the Opera House, Kent, O., beginning Sunday, Jan. 24, 291, at 2. P.M. Program: Music, lectures, discussion, and lifting of the debt incurred in adding he last fifty volumes to our library. Brother Charlesworth generously set the ball rolling by giving his services one evening—a noble example to others who make a living or profit out of the spread of the Secular philosophy. It is hoped that our brethren within reach will help us by their presence, and visiting friends will find a hearty welcome with the members. By order of the ex. committee Kent Secular Union.—Ira Marsh, Jos. Heighton, L. G. Reed, Geo. W. Andrews, M. H. Heighton; H. W. Doncaster, manager; M. Heighton, secretary.

Why Not Apply This to the Clergy?

From the Herald.

In one respect the Africans are in advance of the citizens of Kansas in their attitude toward rainmakers. If the African rainmaker's promised shower is too slow in arriving he is burnt at the stake. A provision for burning the Kansas rainmaker in case of his failure to keep his contract would hav an excellent effect in discouraging other rainmakers, but it is to be feared that no such provision exists.

Letters of Friends.

In Union There Is Strength for Ohio Freethinkers.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say to the Freethinkers of Ohio that I am very much in favor of Mr. Charlesworth's idea of a state Union of Freethinkers of Ohio, and would like to urge all to unite. Come together, and make a grand success of our first effort. By all means let us organize.

Word from a Truth-Speaker to a Truth-Publisher.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: On last Sunday I spoke to an appreciativ audience on the wharf, and distributed my papers from May last to date. I was aided by Brother Scott, who by the way is an earnest worker, and a pioneer in this particular work. I hope that our labor may result in opening the eyes of many to the truth of science and thus show up that greatest of impositions, the Bible. Yours for progress,

WM. PATTERSON.

An Improvement on Christian Morality.

PERRYVILLE, PA., Dec. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5—$3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, the other $2 to pay for two Bible Picture Books when they are ready. Now, this is the way I would like to see all of your subscribers doing—as soon as their time comes renew at once. As soon as I cannot pay for the good old TRUTH SEEKER I will let you know not to send it any longer. I do not think it is right to take your labor and then make you hav to beg for your pay. Yours truly.

Important Subjects Lectured On.

Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: On Wednesday, 16th inst., the Liberals of Flatonia were entertained by a lecture by C. S. Bell, Esq., of Portland, Ore. His subject was "Liberty and Morality," and in an address of about an hour and a half's length he presented his view of this subject in a clear and logical manner. His idea was to present what is true Liberty and what are the proper functions of government, and how far Morality—that is, mos, moris, custom—should control us in our relations with our fellow-men. Brother Bell is an earnest and radical thinker, and has the courage to speak his convictions. We commend him to Liberals everywhere. B.

This Affection Is Well Placed.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been housekeeper in the family of one of your subscribers for five years past, and hav read and enjoyed your excellent paper, and hope that my few lines may find a place in it. I am a great admirer of noble men, women, and children (especially Mr. R. G. Ingersoll, hence my lines), and think to hold them up as patterns for others is the best stimulant to awaken the qualities of love of approbation and self-esteem, and so cultivate goodness, integrity, and sincerity of character, which so many people do not possess nowadays.

I LIKE INGERSOLL.

I like Ingersoll. Well, what for?
'Cause he's jolly and a good neighbor.

I like Ingersoll. Well, how much?
Just like a brother, when his hand I touch.

I like Ingersoll. It is when
He's more than a match for other men.

His love is free! He talks for all.
He works. I like Ingersoll!

We like Ingersoll. Now be true—
Don't you like him because he likes you?

THE FLAG.

Origin of the Y. M. C. A.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Dec. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in a copy of your most excellent paper a book advertised which givs a history of the Young Men's Christian Association. I beg to add what little I know on the subject. In 1849, in the unsettled regions of California, the "yellow mule" (as a translation from the Mexican would make it) became so valuable that you could see signs up at every ranch like the following, "Yellow jacks here." Then came a rival, in the form of a white mule. Well, he had his run, and then some enterprising Yankee discovered that a cross between the yellow and white was most profitable. These probably had the best reputation of any, and "Yellow mule crossed asses" could be seen on all sides. At the same time there were a few psalm-singing young men in that part of the country who were getting up an association of a religious kind. Now let it be remembered that printing was very rare in those days. These mule men had been using large printed capital letters and "Yellow mule crossed asses" came to be simply Y. M. C. A. But it soon became a useless and unworthy enterprise. The young psalm-singing gents took up the discarded sign, as some of us persuaded them it was very appropriate, and after that it became very popular. I am sorry to see a society of this excellent origin abused as some thoughtless wretches are doing.

Yours exclusivly in the interest of truth,

B. R. ANDERSON.

A Rousing Lecture.

STRASBURG, ILL., Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Once more it has become my duty to report. Mr. John R. Charlesworth gave us two lectures—first, "The Bible Not a Good Moral Guide;" second, "Why I Do Not Believe in God." The first night it rained, but friends came six miles to the lecture. The second night was gloomy. The Methodists had an oyster supper; the Lutherans a Christmas tree; the young folks a dance, while the Baptists are rallying to the "help of the Lord against the mighty." So our audience was not as large as it would hav been had there been no other attraction. But we enjoyed the lecture. The friends may want to know how we liked Mr. Charlesworth. We hav listened to Remsburg, Bell, Watts, and Reynolds, so after the lecture I said I would like to know how many felt as I did, and made a motion that we hav not listened to better lectures in Strasburg. The motion was carried with applause, which fired Mr. Charlesworth off again. He arose and poured forth for five minutes the grandest tribute to Liberalism that it ever fell to the lot of man to listen to. He is quite young, but no audience will be disappointed who secure his service. Were I making the scroll of the defenders of Universal Mental Liberty, his name would be found very near the top. We are better off financially than before he came, or in other words, he leaves us better than he found us. And may the species of the turkey that we devoured at Mr. Bernhard's never cease to gobble. A. YORK.

All Reforms Are Welcome Here, Sir.

D——, O., Dec. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am going to write to you a short article on intemperance, but I do not suppose it will amount to anything. However, I am not advocating temperance, and I do not suppose you are publishing a temperance journal and I do not wish to occupy any of your valuable space for that purpose. Everyone, however, has his own views on intemperance. But, in regard to it, is it not a wonder they do not try to do something in this world to check intemperance—that is, try to hav people liv in this world instead of trying to hav them liv in the next world while they are living in this world? It would probably be better if some people did not liv in any world at all. Intemperance has come to be quite an annoyance here. The other night I had a window-glass broken in a side window by some one trying to take a snooze, and in repairing the damage the next day all the glass in the top of an eight-foot show-case was smashed, the show-case being in front and close up against the window. Now, in regard to intemperance I would say that Prohibition does not prohibit. We had Prohibition here at one time. High license does not prohibit intemperance, and besides, that givs a rich saloonist an advantage over a poor saloonist in carrying on the business. It is true the higher the license the fewer the saloons, but the more adulterated and the more injurious. Also two or three saloons can do a business equal to a dozen saloons. They can cause just as much intemperance and starve just as many families, etc. But how would this plan work, and why could it not be carried out: Hav every saloonist pay a reasonable license, but for each and every case of intoxication occurring in any town or city, hav each and every saloon where any such case occurs pay a fine of $5 to $50. No saloonist would then sell to any one when he had drank all that was necessary. A SUBSCRIBER.

An Unsilenceable Schoolteacher.

GROVE, TEX., Dec. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I liv in a community where superstition reigns supreme. All my neighbors, or nearly all, are not even Liberal enough to commune with each other—eat bread and drink wine. Though I am alone, I enjoy my own society, as I hav Darwin's, Huxley's, and "Tom" Paine's works to read, which are the very best that can be got. I teach school, which brings my religious views more before the public than if I was only a farmer. I keep nothing back that I believe or disbelieve, but speak on every occasion my own convictions in regard to religious superstition. I tell them I am tired of hearing the tragedy of the cross. I hav heard nothing for twenty-five years but blood! blood! blood! till I am tired and sick. They told me all my life if I would believe all this tomfoolery perhaps I would get a sugar-plum by and by. They tell me I must believe all that bosh about "the immaculate conception," which is the most ridiculous thing ever believed by man. They tell me God has all power, is all-merciful and all-wise; then tell me in the next breath God made the first man and woman, put them in a garden, put them in the great fine place surrounded with beautiful fruit-trees, endowed them with desires for eating the fruit, and still further made a serpent and sent him to our mother Eve to inform her in the uses of this desirable fruit, and damned Adam and his whole posterity to everlasting hell-fire for doing a thing he could not help. Think of damning all the world for the disobedience of one man and woman, and call this wisdom, love, and mercy! Then God made a plan to rectify his mistake and made such a blunder that he saves, according to religious statistics, only one out of one hundred. All this is done, they say, for his own glory. I am like Colonel Bob in all this. I think this doctrin was born of the grin of hyenas. It was born of the eyes of snakes—snakes that hung in fearful coils watching for their prey. I am like him—I hate it with every drop of my blood.

This is my first article on this subject to any newspaper. A. A. BRADLEY.

On the Dullness of Religious Papers, and the Conversion of Satan.

ADRIAN, MICH., Dec. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: One has but to look over the columns of the New York Christian Advocate to realize the utter barrenness of the orthodox religion. You fail to find one genial expression in the religious department. The dry and stubbly matter has been thrashed over so much. Not an elevating idea or scientific conclusion has been evolved since its inception. Not one single cheering thought has been uttered nor one benign emotion created in the mind of man. Its teaching engenders gloom even to those its votaries. The doctrin is to the soul as the cold decoction is to the suicide who seeks death rather than endure a living oblivion of hope. Not a single ray of cheer to the devotee of superstition—all gloom—not one intellectual inspiration in the whole fallacy. What is more depressing or heartless than the Calvinistic doctrin to those who know it to be false? A doctrin that does not emit one flash of intellectuality or the slightest emotion of benevolence should be forever consigned to its early advocates and abettors, the murderers of Bruno and Servetus—John Calvin and his ilk. They should hav the felicity of an eternal wrestle with what they imposed upon their victims.

Allow me to descant briefly on the appearance of the devil in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The inimitable design makes him look real purty. The astonishment of the priest is very manifest. No wonder. It is a startling request—to baptize the devil is something outside the usual routine. The devil asking for baptismal unction is of unusual eclat. He is already a mingler with church people, but wants to be a legalized brother. Baptize him, by all means. He is probably sincere; that qualification is not to be doubted. His conversion and status in the church will ultimately bring about universal salvation. But that will be a drawback to the sky-pilots. They will hav to seek other employment—scratch or go hungry. Yes, take the illustrious whelp in full fellowship. He has been with you a long time on probation. The possibility is, he will become a shining light among the brethering and sistering. It will relieve the other fellow of much worry if the devil is converted. You will ask, What shall be done with his trademarks? I suggest, dehorn him, lash his caudal appendage up his spine, be careful not to expose the spear on his tail above his paper collar—ah, his wings—yes, let him keep 'em, angels hav wings.

Calls It a Glorious New Revelation.

FLAT CREEK, LA., Dec. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The great apostles of Infidelity, Colonel Ingersoll, Thomas Paine, et al, taught me to believe that "reason, experience, and observation" were the only basis of knowledge, and that reason was a safer guide than revelation. But now comes Dr. W. P. Brooks, who appears to be an inspired writer, and knocks reason out of the ring. The experiment of France, under the leadership of John Law, our own experiment with legal-tender paper during the late war, and the recent experiment of the Argentine Republic led me to believe that the fiat of government could not regulate the value of money, or of a paper substitute for money. Reason, experience, and observation taught me that the value of money depended upon the intrinsic value of the material of which money was made. Now Dr. Brooks mercilessly exposes my ignorance and tells us that gold and silver hav no intrinsic value and that the value of money depends solely upon the decree of government. This is a glorious new revelation. Why did God withhold it from us so long? When the children of Israel demanded a king, God told them that they asked for an evil thing, but he would grant them their request. Now the people are demanding cheap money, another evil thing, and God has made this revelation through Dr. Brooks, that the people may obtain what they ask. Now, as the value of money in no way depends upon the material of which it is made, when the church and the Farmers' Alliance hav succeeded in making a place in our national Constitution for their God, or a supreme being, and hav proclaimed Christ the king of nations and hav placed a vicegerent as a divine autocrat upon the throne, he can decree that a piece of any solid substance one inch square and one-tenth of an inch thick shall be called a dollar and be legal tender for debts, public and private. These dollars can be subdivided into halves and quarters, and the multiples of a dollar can be made in cubes, plates, and bars. As the value of money will depend only upon its size and shape and the fiat of government, it will not need any stamping or printing on it. No man will hav a monopoly of money-making material and every man can make his own money, and no law against counterfeiting will be needed. Money will become cheap enough to satisfy the most economical. The children can build doll-houses of dollars. What a glorious revelation!

That "Hard-Money Man" Assailed.

ST. ANSGAR, IA., Dec. 21, 291.

MR. EDITOR: H. Murray, the "Hard-Money Man," in the December 12th TRUTH SEEKER, has all the reasoning faculty necessary for an orthodox debater, and should hasten to apply his money theory to theology and be ordained.

There is no metal the world could better dispense with than gold or silver. Take away from it the legal exchange power and all people would be better off. Suppose a nation of one hundred families began business without anything saved. They would hav a natural right to make an exchange medium to transact their business. Say they carve out fifty chips for each, and as a body make them all equally good. They hav then five thousand chips cash. Now they go to work, each in different industries, some fishing, others trapping, others inventing implements, and so on. The most industrious will hav a large surplus of produced wealth to sell for chips. The value of the commodity will depend on supply and demand and not on the chips any more than the pound would depend on the special make of scales. As the nation grew and misers hoarded the chips, the nation could make more chips, keeping within the value of saved labor, and chip millionaires would be as great freaks as would merchants nowadays who would get a desire for yardsticks to the extent of collecting them by the thousand or million. All the chips any man would care to hav about him would be just enough to balance with in trade. He would not care for more yardsticks or chips than absolutely necessary. These chips would be an exchange medium and the only honest money. To make a valuable commodity a money is nothing less than a swindle, and there would be as much reason for requiring all yardsticks to be made from gold and inlaid with diamonds as to require money to be made from gold. Money should hav no value in itself, merely represent value, and a note secured by the nation is far safer than one secured by gold without the nation's guarantee, and as long as it is the guarantee which makes the value, why fool with the orthodox superstition of metal money?

The last war illustrated what a curse gold or valued commodity is to a people as money. The man who owned $50,000 in property or green money was a patriot to the amount of $50,000, while the man with $50,000 in gold was a traitor to this country to the amount of forty cents on the dollar. I believe hard money a curse. Giv us our own confidence for exchange and sharks will leave from among us.

Among thieves a man's gold or other property is of small value, while among honest people it is of highest value. Then honesty and justice giv an increase of value to property, gold; and hence the honesty of a nation is a better standard for exchange than gold.

Respectfully, DR. A. J. CLAUSEN.

Hard On Unprompt Subscribers.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—$3 for my TRUTH SEEKER, $2 in aid of the pictures, and $1 for Bible Picture Book; also $2 for a new subscriber and $2 for Bible Picture Books. Notice is given of a New Year's dress for THE TRUTH SEEKER—all right so far—but "it will appear in a more modern make-up, so arranged that the subscribers who desire to forward the paper to semi-Liberal friends, but are deterred because of a fear that the pictures will offend their semi-religious sensitivness, can remove the objectionable matter without destroying any of the reading matter." Do religionists remove objectionable matter from their publications on account of any sensitivness of the one they giv it to? Of course not. They act on the assumption that they are right in their belief, claiming that it is based on inspiration. I think less of such inspiration than I do of perspiration. They care nothing for the sensitivness of anyone. One who is afraid of sending the pictures because it might offend the sensitivness of the recipient must be a semi-Liberal, to say the least. Balzac said, "Sensitiv people are not sensible people." Very likely the "make-up" will cause an added expense to THE TRUTH SEEKER; if so I do not approve of it. Here is something that ought to make all semi-Liberals sensitiv enough to pay their honest dues, and if the "make-up" will obviate the necessity of publishing such a notice to so-called Freethinkers, I am in favor of it: "To Our Subscribers: We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions. Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests, our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us." An election that will cause Liberals to be so remiss as to infringe on decency and honesty, is worse in its effects than the old orthodox doctrin of election, which was only imaginary; but the trouble from such an election as this can best be remedied by obeying Paul when he said, "Owe no man anything." Horace Greeley's plan will help you to obey Paul. He said, "Avoid pecuniary obligations as you would famin or pestilence. If you hav but fifty cents and can get no more for a week, buy a peck of corn, parch it, and liv on it, rather than owe a man a dollar." I do not blame the Editor for publishing the above notice to subscribers, yet I hav an unspeakable aversion to whatever caused the necessity for him to publish it. The Freethinker that does not pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER if he is a subscriber, unless sickness has prevented, is worse than this description of a Communist:

What is a Communist? One who hath yearnings
For equal division of unequal earnings;
Idler or bungler, or both, he is willing
To fork out his penny and take up your shilling.

You do not fork out your penny but take THE TRUTH SEEKER, which shillings hav no value to adequately represent. Stop this travesty on being a Freethinker and pay for the best Freethought paper. Yours is only one, but remember to Think naught a trifle though it small appear.

Sands form the mountain, moments make the year.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

An Accusation of Illiberalism.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Dec. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It has been many months since I hav said anything through your paper, as my health has been very bad and consequently I not inclined to write; and as this may be my last letter, I feel it a duty to be plain as well as brief. I became a subscriber in September, 1874. With the exception of two years I hav been a regular subscriber all these seventeen years past. The cause of these two off years was, not being in a fit condition to read, in consequence of nervous headache, which I hav suffered much with in my past life—which has been lengthened to something over sixty years. I will also say, I hav always paid in advance for my paper. I do not think an honest man will remain on the subscription list of a paper and read it and not pay for it. Such men claiming to be Liberals are worse than Christians. I am sorry to say this, but I feel it a duty in my farewell remarks. There is something else that givs me mental pain to say. That is, that my time expires the 4th of January on the (with but few exceptions) greatest of Liberal papers. I now feel it a duty to myself and wife, the only family I hav, to say, when that time arrives discontinue it to my address. My health is so bad I am not able to do much work, consequently need the $3 to help bridge over life's journey the few remaining days we hav to stay here, and in connection with bidding a sad farewell to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers I also feel it a duty to say: While in the past deriving untold pleasure from perusing the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, I hav ofttimes been mentally disturbed by seeing articles penned by those claiming to be Liberals which to my mind were as illiberal and possessed of as much bigotry as it is common to find coming from a fanatical descendant of John Calvin. This spirit of intolerance has been exhibited in the discussion of Spiritualism. If I am possessed of sufficient intelligence to know what my present status of opinion should properly be termed, I am an Agnostic, Materialist, never having had evidence enough in my investigations of Spiritualism to say I was a Spiritualist. However, I find from observation through THE TRUTH SEEKER I am differently organized from very many who claim to be Materialists and Agnostics, notable among whom I may name the two Wettsteins, Ella Gibson, and many others who are so dogmatic and assume to know of so much fraud in Spiritualism, and can not—or do not—giv us any information whatever in regard to the question, Does death end all? I also observe that for the last few years we are seldom gratified to read articles from the fertil pens of such men and women as McArthur, Burr, J. R. Perry, Wetherbee, W. E. Coleman, Mrs. Lake, Mrs. Severance, and a host of others. My conclusions may be unfounded, but I am of the opinion they are disgusted with the illiberal, dogmatic manner of those who, while claiming to be Agnostic, know so much and explain so little. I will now close, for it is possible that I am taking softening of the brain. However, I endeavor to view matters calmly and am inclined to believe we are all what our environments hav developed our opinions to be. So let us find as little fault as possible. Wishing you and THE TRUTH SEEKER great success in all laudable enterprises, I am WM. A. THOMPSON.

Fear That the Reformed Ministers Are Not Reformed.

FORNEY, TEX., Dec. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Some of the people, myself included, of this thriving little town hav just been treated to two characteristic lectures from that whole-hearted Liberal, W. S. Bell. Bad weather prevented the attendance from being as large as it would otherwise hav been. It was such weather as to take the snap and vim out of anything, and I am satisfied if our Christian neighbors had not found out what a boomerang it was they would hav worked the providential intervention racket upon us, but of their present position in regard to the same there may be more aptness in likening it unto that of an egg-sucking dog who had been peppered and sickened so often that finally he would tuck his tail and run as if for dear life at the mere sight of anything looking like an egg. It is so sad I must weep a few; and then get back to Brother W. S. Bell's methods of spreading Freethought as displayed by his lectures here. One or two of our Forney Liberals seemed to think that, like vitriol, he was too cutting and biting, while others chuckled as if in him they had stumbled upon the best thing of their lives; and still others objected upon the score that he had remaining too much of the Christian ministerial tricks and mannerisms. Possibly the latter objection might not hav been found if Mr. Bell had not freely announced the fact that he was an ex-Methodist minister. Observing what miserable slaves we all are to habits acquired through early or long-continued environment, it would seem that we could not be too cautious here in fault-finding, to say nothing of the fact that we can see the hump upon our neighbor's back but not upon our own; or, as Epicurus puts it, "every man thinks that perfection that he is himself—that the only knowledge that he possesses—and that the only pleasure that he pursues." As, for instance, Mr. Jones thinks the rippling wit of Mr. Smith to be flippancy, while Mr. Smith retorts by thinking the earnestness of Mr. Jones to be stupidity, and the truth is, if either should try to act out the other's nature, it would be as miserable a failure as it would be with an elephant trying to take the soaring flight of an eagle.

In candor it must be said that my deepest respect is reserved for those Freethought champions who are ex-ministers of Christianity, as are such men as Shaw, Pentecost, Putnam, Bell, and York, because when they hoisted the standard of Freethought their means of subsistence were far more immediately cut off thereby than if it had been done by men following any other method of subsistence. Hence, in doing what these ex-ministers hav done there was more desperate courage than was required of Cortez in burning his ships. And thus my obeisance is made to them.

I believe, if it had been my fate to hav started in life as either of them did, I never would hav dared to step out in the cold without leaving the door open for a return to my warm, cosy orthodox pulpit. Threatened starvation would hav made me take to trembling flight, and from thence on I would hav humbugged the world to its heart's content—ay! with the envenomed spite of a cornered cat. And maybe we hav reached such a point that the most orthodox hell-fire and brimstone preacher would turn more faces toward Infidelity than one not so orthodox. But to resume about our latest Freethought lecturer. For my part, I hav nothing but praise for comrade W. S. Bell, if there be no fault in one having so thoroughly abandoned the anti-naturalistic ideas of Christianity as to be unconsciously influenced in speech and act as if a contemporary majority were nodding approval. A faint resemblance, it could be called, to the good old Methodist sister who, never having read anything but Methodist literature, came to think that if the majority of her contemporaries were not proclaimed Methodists, it was not because they were not so inclined.

And no doubt I hav this kind of a hump on my back as big as anybody.

GEO. T. BONDIES.

Great To-do Over a Lecture.

ORILLIA, ONT., Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had a field-day in Orillia, and Secularism has come out victorious. The Rev. Dr. Sexton preached twice on Sunday and lectured on Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week. On Sunday evening the church was crowded, but his plain way of putting things shocked the feelings of a great many of the goody-goody, and in anticipation of what was about to follow they did not show up at the lectures; but those who represent the advance thought and a higher plane of Christianity were on hand, and sending up a shower of questions brought out the truth in all its beauty, although it was mixed with a little theology and although he was lecturing in a Methodist church. This is among other good things in what he said: Heaven is not away beyond the stars; it was on this earth. He proved that the universe was eternal. The moment a man died he opened his spiritual eyes on the earth right where he lay, and this was heaven. He did not believe in hell, but seemed to think there was a kind of uncomfortable unsurveyed commons out back, or away back where the devil and a few of his friends might camp out until they could be provided for in some other way. We asked him if he thought that a true believer could drink poison without hurting him. His answer was, No—that the seven last verses of the last chapter of Mark were spurious and untrue and should not be in the book at all, and also many other parts of the New Testament. He did not believe that the sun and moon stood still, as recorded. He said that the early Christian did not convert the pagan but that the pagan converted the Christian, and that all our forms and ceremonies are pagan. Our holy days were days set apart to commemorate the birth of some pagan god. Even our Christmas, that is so near at hand and that we will celebrate with so much prayer and piety, was a day set apart for the worship of a heathen god hundreds of years before our Christ was born of a virgin (or begotten by a ghost holy or otherwise). The words in parentheses are mine. In fact, he upset many of the Christian Gods. He seemed to think that it was the last time he would get a chance to lecture in this church, and like a bull in a china shop, he broke as many gods as possible. When he sat down after finishing his last lecture two ministers of the gospel, one a Presbyterian and the other an English Churchman, objected to some of the statements, and we should hav had a lively time had it not been for the Rev. Dr. Gray, who cut off all further debate by moving a vote of thanks to the lecturer. But in doing so he unfortunately referred to Mr. Sexton's previous remarks on phrenology and corroborated his assertion that all intellectual giants of history had small heads, and stated that he had heard the great Dr. Chalmers preach and that his head was small, and inferior to that of the man who sat near him, who was a drunkard and so deficient in intellect that he ought to be in an asylum. This wild statement was not allowed to pass, but was flatly contradicted the next day by our local phrenologist, Mr. Madden, who submitted proof of the untruthfulness of his statement, and will publish the facts in a local paper.

The Rev. Dr. Sexton's lecture at all events will greatly increase the Freethought ranks in Orillia—which according to Mr. Duval, who lectured here a few weeks ago, is a regular hot-bed of Freethought. The Rev. Dr. Sexton in the course of his lecture twisted the Sabbath or seventh day into Sunday the first of the week. The process is called hocus-pocus—a new science used in the churches at present.

The Rev. Mr. Gray also said that doubting the Bible was a disease, and the poor victims were in the same fix as the drunkard, and the church should pray for them and ask God to open their eyes. If I had been allowed to reply to him I would hav told him that the great Dr. Chalmers was a doubter and all the great men of our day were doubters, but the man with the thick skull of which he spoke was no doubter. The asylums are filled with true believers.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Kettle On the Crane.

A HOME SONG.

How many pleasant pictures does the recollection bring
Of home and bygone pleasures that around the fireside cling!
What tender reminiscences come thronging on the brain
When in dreams I hear the singing of the kettle on the crane!—
Hear it singing, singing, singing,
Loud and merry, fast and slow;
Hear it murmur, murmur, murmur,
Soft and low.

There's the broad, wide-open chimney, with its roaring, crackling fire,
Built up with logs of gen'rous size to make the flames leap higher;
And near the waiting table stands, spread bountiful and plain.
While cheerily the kettle sings and sings upon the crane.
Hear it singing, singing, singing,
Loud and merry, fast and slow;
Hear it murmur, murmur, murmur,
Soft and low.

Grandmother in the corner sits, and softly to and fro
She rocks, and dreams of friends and scenes in days of long ago;
Her face grows sweet and tender as the past comes back again,
While listening to the singing of the kettle on the crane.
Hear it singing, singing, singing,
Loud and merry, fast and slow.
Hear it murmur, murmur, murmur,
Soft and low.

I see the children caper, as with gleeful laugh and call
They watch the dancing pictures of the shadows on the wall.
And hear the baby cooing to the mother's low refrain
That follows the soft music of the kettle on the crane.
Hear it singing, singing, singing,
Loud and merry, fast and slow.
Hear it murmur, murmur, murmur,
Soft and low.

And ere the evening hour is done, with lingering step and slow,
A youth and smiling maiden come, and in the embers' glow
They read the future's story, and they see a wedding train,
And bells chime with the singing of the kettle on the crane.
Hear it singing, etc.

Oh! there's bliss supreme in home, when its joys are pure and sweet,
And life's most sacred memories around the hearthstone meet,
And the tenderest thoughts and saddest ones come borne upon the strain
Of the singing of the kettle as it hangs upon the crane.
Hear it singing, singing, singing,
Loud and merry, fast and slow.
Hear it murmur, murmur, murmur,
Soft and low.

The Old Year and the New.

Time, in its never-ceasing onward journey, has carried us all past the bounds which begin the new year.

The year just finished came a few months ago, as new, as fresh, as inviting, as full of hope and joyous anticipations, as the one just begun, and in a few short months the one just begun will, like the one just ended, with all its joys and sorrows, be banished from our presence in the past, and only in memory will it liv. The ever-changing scenes of time seem like a vast and endless panorama, exhibiting in rapid succession the various phases of human existence and the multiform operations and changes of nature. It is a gorgeous, enchanting picture, tinged with a cloudy mystery that the mind cannot fully penetrate.

If each could see themselvs in this picture as they are seen, some profitable lessons would doubtless be suggested; and this can be, since memory can bring up the past in full review.

Self-examination may not seem pleasant, but it is exceedingly profitable. If we would learn from the school of experience and know how to properly and profitably liv in the future, we must frequently scan the past. If we would make the coming year rich in its blessings to ourselvs and others, we must examin well our conduct in the year that is gone.

What an echo that word "gone" starts in the memory! It speaks to us of precious time wasted, of golden opportunities lost, of unkind words spoken, of uncharitable thoughts cherished, of a false pride unchecked, a low ambition fostered, of petty conspiracies to injure our fellows unrepented of, of the cruel taunt which sunk deep into the heart of a friend, and, alas! of all that we hav done that we should not hav done, and of the many, many things that we hav left undone that we should hav done.

Human deeds are eternal fixtures for good or ill! They may be modified by subsequent action, but can never, never be obliterated. How watchful we should be, then, of our every action. In reviewing the year that is past, and being conscious of our many mistakes, let us, so far as is possible, rectify them by a higher and nobler life in the future.

We hav wished one another "a happy new year;" let us hope that it was an honest, earnest wish of the heart, and not the flippant utterance by the lips of an empty, fashionable compliment. In order to be happy, we must deserve to be happy. All wishes and prayers to be happy, made by ourselvs and our friends, will not secure happiness, unless, by the lives we liv, we deserve it.

We should earnestly wish the great brotherhood of humanity happiness oftener than once a year; and as each succeeding day of the year presents itself a pure and unspotted leaf of time for the record of our deeds, and as each day is a new year's day to that of a year ago, let us each day wish happiness to all, and by our deeds giv such efficacy to our prayer that no foul blot or darkening stain shall taint life's daily leaf the coming year, and joyous benedictions shall rest upon us each day that our lives prove us worthy of receiving them.

Legend Continued.

Seth, Jane, and the raven lived, or starved, under a noble tree; rich Christians only said, when they passed, "They are industrious, let them work it through. We must attend to real beggars who stand ragged in the gutter." Mrs. Murdoc, immensely wealthy and a Christian, really tormented Jane, offering her useless presents, calling on her every day, for nothing, refusing the poor orphans money to buy coal, oil, and bread. Their lonely lamp hung darkly from a leafy bough, while Mrs. Murdoc and her pious friends prayed and sung hymns by moonlight. "Work on," she said; "God will send food when he thinks best. Do as I tell you, or you shall be driven from the shade of this beautiful tree." Mrs. Murdoc was a murderer by nature. She had married a poor young man, and tortured him until he drank to excess, pined away, and died. Widows and orphans fled when she approached. Her feeble, poor relations were thankful to die rather than liv on her bounty. Ignorance, sensuality, and an iron will furnish us with murderers, thieves, and criminals of every description. Jane braided her beautiful hair, a ringlet now and then escaping. She did not fling her locks loosely upon her white neck with the abandon of a wolf or shaggy bear. She walked a short distance to run in debt. Poor Seth was almost sick and needed nourishment. A rich woman invited her into her kitchen. With a cold shudder Jane accepted what she offered. "If you were richly dressed," said this prayerful woman, "I could treat you more like a lady and recognize you on the street."

The raven flew in with jewels worth the wealth of the world upon his neck and wings. "Vulgar woman," said he, "intelligence, honor, and virtue alone are attractiv to me. Come, dear Jane, we will purchase something for Seth. Leave this woman to her own proper hell, her foreclosed mortgages, stolen goods, murdering intrigue, and lying. Let her rot in the infamous grave she has constructed for herself." A black cloud, fringed with fire, suddenly appeared overhead, and the bolt that issued from it would hav destroyed this infamous person but for the exertions of the raven.

Correspondence.

WEST SUTTON, MASS., Dec. 21, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Inclosed is a composition of a pupil of a free public school, wherein morality instead of religion was taught, which I hav been permitted to copy from an unpublished work, "Life in Earnest," for the Corner, hoping it may please you and its many readers.

Truly yours, LUCY W. PHELPS.

[Thanks, dear, for the beautiful essay. Our readers will agree that "Life in Earnest" ought to be published at an early day.—ED. C. C.]

EAST SPRINGPORT, MICH., Dec. 20, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are Freethinkers in this family. We take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I enjoy reading children's letters very much. I hav not seen any letters from East Springport, so thought I would like to write.

I go to school every day; I get along nicely with my studies. My age is twelv. I belong to a library society. We hav over sixty books and about thirty-five members. The oldest one of the society is sixteen.

I think it is nice to educate the young boys and girls.

Well, I think this is long enough for the first. I will close, wishing you a merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Ever your friend, LERNA M. FERGUSON.

DALEVILLE, IND., Dec. 28, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Kind Friend: It has been quite a while since I wrote to you, and I thought I would write again. I went to the Christian church last evening and sat and watched some young converts; it was very interesting to see how they cut up last winter. They had a protracted meeting here and all girls joined but three—my sister, myself, and another girl. One young girl didn't want to join, but her parents hired her to join. They got her an organ and then made her be baptized. She did not hav any more religion than an old stump. Well, I guess I will close this time by wishing you and all Cornerit s a merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Your friend, ROSA REMSBERG.

News of the Week.

In Nieder Wermelskirchen, Germany, a man has been fined $15 for calling another a Socialist.

Chili is investigating the attack on our sailors, seemingly because of the pressure of our demands.

In Mexico wholesale arrests of priests and monks continue. The law against religious orders suspected of treasonable intentions is being strictly enforced.

Jesuit Father Drummond, of Montreal, on the 31st ult. heard from a seemingly reliable source that the pope had been assassinated. Catholics became tremendously excited before undeceived.

The Roman Catholic churches at Vedislay and Buzski, Russia, hav been closed under the czar's decree that no non-Orthodox churches be repaired and those in a dangerous condition be closed.

The Arapahoe chief Left Hand and Cheyenne chiefs Whirlwind and Old Crow hav collected one thousand Indians and all are dancing the ghost dance, which they intend to continue till the messiah comes..

In gratitude for services rendered this nation by the czars, especially in menacing British warships who threatened hostility to us during our Rebellion, Western millers hav offered Russia forty-eight thousand barrels of flour.

The journalist Joseph Howard, Jr., at a New Year's dinner said that the editors of to-day hav the responsibility to ward off three threatening evils—the downfall of our schools in their unsectarian purity, a war of races, and a war of religionists.

Neal Sims, brother of the dead moonshiner and founder of a new religion, Bob Sims, is at large and resolved to avenge his brother. He firmly believes that Bob was a prophet from God, commissioned to exterminate the devil's agents, law officers.

During mass at St. Joseph's church, Hoboken, N. J., last Sunday, a stranger interrupted and began to harang the congregation. When he saw policemen coming he dropped on his knees and began to pray fervently, but his prayer availed not and the officers carried him off.

Miss Gladys Price, organist of the New York Mariners' church, who was shot some time ago by a religious maniac, has had another religious crank named Pearson arrested for annoying her. He has been following her and dinning into her ear, "Trust in the Lord!"

The wife of Ralph Whittle, an Episcopalian, of New York, in a plea for limited divorce says that she is a Catholic and that because of the difference in their religion she has been compelled "to submit to abusiv and foul language." He has been in the habit of calling her, among other things, a "priest's mistress."

William Hooley, a professional singer, of Nyack, N. Y., volunteered to sing at a Masonic fair, but afterward declined be cause forbid by Rev. Father Crosby, of St. Ann's Catholic church. Out of this a quarrel has grown that involves all the Masons and Catholics of Rockland county. Each party boycotts opposed merchants. Masons' wives refuse Catholic servants.

On the 31st ult. a large crowd gathered around the Convent of the Good Shepherd, St. Louis, to witness the efforts to escape of a girl who had climbed on the wall. She was pulled back. A reporter was refused access to the girl or to the mother superior, and denied information. It is said that the girl is named Cowena, has some Indian blood, and was placed there by Mrs. Kerens, a rich patroness of the institution.

The magistracy of Vienna, at the instance of the public prosecutor, hav issued a decree commanding the closing of the Methodist church there. They hav also prohibited Pastor Roesch from preaching anywhere in the city, on the ground that his "Methodistic denunciation of masses as 'blasphemous fables' and 'dangerous conceits'" is an insult against the Catholic religion, which is recognized by the state.

Hungarian and Polish miners of Beaver Brook, Pa., believe Mrs. Mary Paupkoe a witch. Mike Molla is the principal sufferer from her spells. She has, he says, caused his cow to die. At night, although she livs a mile away, she pulls his bedclothes, shakes the bed, and tweaks his nose. One night she pulled the pillow from under his head, and again jerked him out of bed. Getting out of bed in the morning he will run a splinter in his toe or step on a tack; at breakfast the coffee, boiling hot, will be spilt on his legs; picking up his spade and shovel to go to work, one of them will fall on his foot. In the mines he will be hurt by flying splinters from a blast or his fingers will be bruised by a fall of coal. At noon he will discover that he has taken one of his boarders' pails, and consequently does not hav enough to eat. Unless Mrs. Paupkoe stops causing these things, Molla says, he will kill her.

Gems of Thought.

When the million applaud you, seriously ask yourself what harm you hav done; when they censure you, what good.—Colton.

A Christian asked me: "What hav you to liv for now?" His tone implied that the loss of a belief in hell removed all impetus to benevolence and philanthropy. I replied: "A thousand-fold more than ever. To benefit men here and now, to promote commerce, to advance society, to influence the future of the race. The world has opened out before me full of possibility and hope, tempting me to effort by its opportunities and affording joy in its prospects."—Robt. C. Adams.

There was never any more inception than there is now,
Nor any more youth or age than there is now,
And will never be any more perfection than there is now,
Nor any more heaven or hell than there is now.

Urge and urge and urge,
Always the procreant urge of the world.
Out of the dimness opposit equals advance, always substance and increase, always sex,
Always a knit of identity, always distinction, always a breed of life.
—Walt Whitman.

Where did education come from? For a thousand years Christianity destroyed books and paintings and statues. For a thousand years Christianity was filled with hatred toward every effort of the human mind. We got paper from the Moors. Printing had been known thousands of years before, in China. A few manuscripts, containing a portion of the literature of Greece, a few enriched with the best thoughts of the Roman world, had been preserved from the general wreck and ruin wrought by Christian hate. These became the seeds of intellectual progress. For a thousand years Christianity controled Europe. The Mohammedans were far in advance of the Christians with hospitals and asylums and institutions of learning. —Ingersoll.

Men are everywhere inconsistent alike. They hav made laws by piecemeal, as breaches are repaired in walls. Here the eldest sons take everything they are able from the younger ones; there all share equally. Sometimes the church has ordered duels, sometimes it has anathematized them. The partisans and the opponents of Aristotle hav been both excommunicated in their turn; as hav, also, the wearers of long hair and short hair. There has been but one perfect law in the world, and that was designed to regulate a species of folly—that is to say, play. The laws of play are the only ones which admit of no exception, relaxation, change, or tyranny. A man who has been a lackey, if he play at lansquénet with kings, is paid with perfect readiness when he wins. In other cases the law is everywhere a sword, with which the strongest party cuts in pieces the weakest.—Voltaire.

How, then, your book discarded, am I to know anything about you? I shall lay aside your book, and take to your church. Your church, O Lord, not only has heard of you, but it knows you, has you, and eats you. Read, mark, learn, eat, and inwardly digest. Perhaps you are not aware of it, O Lord, but your creatures hav been gnawing away and eating at you for centuries. It is possible that you may hav the faculty of growing as fast as you are eaten. But, if you hav not this faculty, some day when you go to put on your sandals you may find that you hav got one foot only, and when you attempt to sit down at your father's right hand, which is your own right hand, you may find that you hav nothing in particular left to sit down with, but that it has all been eaten away. At your last supper you gave expression to some cannibal-like remark about eating your flesh and drinking your blood, and your saints and sinners hav, ever since, taken you at your word. Eating and drinking is quite in their line—in fact, eating and drinking are almost the only two functions that hav been conscientiously performed by a worldful of blockheads. Well, O Lord, your idiots took to eating you. Many millions hav eaten you in the sense that they hav made their living out of you by buffooning in pulpits and elsewhere; but that is not what I mean. I mean that millions and millions and millions are eating at you daily and hav been doing so for centuries. True, they eat very little bits of you at a time; but it must all tell in the long run. If you permit this eat, eat, eating to go on for another century or two, you will rise some fine morning to find yourself unpleasantly like a cabbage leaf that has been gnawed by caterpillars, or a carrot that has been perforated by worms. If I were in your shoes, I should stop this eating and eating at the altar and communion table.—Saladin in God and His Book.

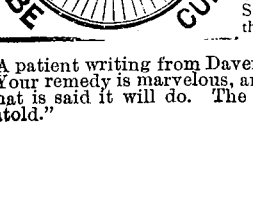
Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

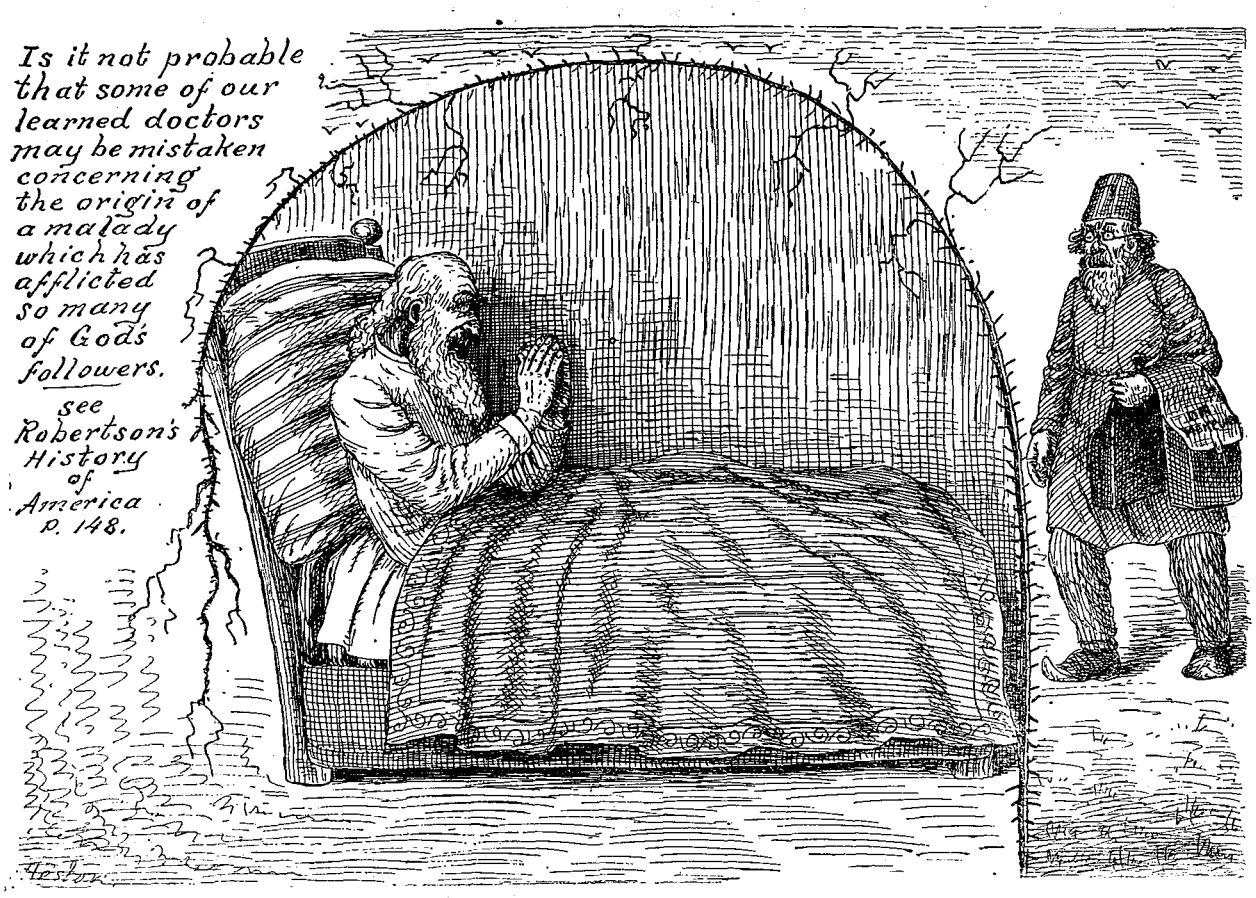
Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I hav been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.



Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Russia.

Freethinkers should, as we said last week, not neglect the present surpassing opportunity of observing the workings of the Christian religion in a people completely permeated with it—viz., the Russian nation. In that nation they now may witness the horrors that flow from undoubting belief in the Christian faith. They may behold it in its culmination, with its victims plunged in ignorance and barbarism, the coöperating state despotism swollen with hard-wrung gains and arrogant power, knowledge discountenanced, science eradicated, dissenters persecuted, the few brave patriots and rebels in prisons or convict colonies, and famins and pestilences arising from the whole of this misrule threatening to desolate the land. Observers, we say, may now see going on before their eyes in actual life the same train of events which they hav read of as occurring during the Middle Ages and which they expected, or at least hoped, never to know in directer form than through their histories.

In our present article we will first notice the persecution of heretics.

The Greek Catholic clergy and the public officials continue to war against nonconformists to the state religion as though mad. So extreme is the persecution that it is a perilous thing for one to be related in any way to a pervert. He is in danger of being taken to task for not preventing the perversion. The code says, in Article 192, that anyone who, knowing that his wife or children, or other persons for whom he is legally responsible, intend to secede from the orthodox church, does not strive to dissuade them from this sinful intention, or takes no lawful measures for preventing the secession, will be punished with imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, and if he be a member of the orthodox faith will be handed over to the ecclesiastical powers for disciplinary punishment. Parents not leading their children to the sacrament (beginning when the children are seven years old), are to be subject to special disciplinary measures, and the attention of the civil authorities is to be directed to their conduct.

In a series of valuable letters to the New York Times, Harold Frederic thus characterizes the situation:

"The whole massed pack of Russian officials hav excited themselvs into a gigantic wild-jagd of heretics and unbelievers all over the empire. Franzos tells of a Polish prince, Czartoryski, who went gunning among the Jews of his district of Barnow 'because there was so little game left in the neighborhood.' There is a good deal of this same barbarous lust for blood-letting sport in what we are witnessing now. A shot is being taken at everything that rises: Mennonites, Stundists, the Molokani, the Finns, the Catholic Poles, the Germans, the Jews alike."

The same writer describes the inception of the present persecution of the Jews. He relates that in 1890 the position of the Jews had been growing more and more intolerable as the spirit of the Holy Synod more fully permeated the ramified branches of the bureaucracy. "It was reported about that the czar regarded the escape alive of himself and family from the terrible railroad accident at Borki as the direct and miraculous intervention of Providence. The facts were that the imperial train was being driven at the rate of ninety versts an hour over a road calculated to withstand at the utmost a speed of thirty-five versts; that the engineer humbly warned the czar of the danger, and was gruffly ordered to go still faster if possible; and that the miracle would hav been the avoidance of calamity. But facts don't get about in Russia, or pass unrecognized if they do. What was apparent was that a great devotional mood had seized upon the czar and the court circles. The contagion spread like wildfire; in a twinkling officials, soldiers, policemen, traders, moujiks, flocked to the churches, cabmen blocked the streets in front of shrines to make their obeisances from the driver's box, and the country roads were populated once more with concourses of tramping pilgrims. It was in the hight of this sentimental religious fervor that reports leaked out about the government's intention to revoke the guarantees of 1865, and put the May laws in force all over the empire. Copies of the proposed edicts were obtained, smuggled out over the frontier, and published to the world. The Holy Synod stopped counting its beads long enough to issue a categorical denial that any such measure had even been discussed, and Russian embassadors at foreign courts gave solemn assurances that the report was pure invention. When they had lied long enough, the edicts which they swore had never existed even in thought were promulgated. It was a triumph of medieval barbarism. Everywhere throughout Russia it was understood that, to celebrate God's protection of the czar at Borki, there was to be a burnt offering of Jews."

We are indebted to the same paper for a description of another feature of the cunning oppression of the Jews. This is the steady restriction of callings that the Jews were permitted to follow outside the pale. Under the system of 1865 all Jews who were "artisans" were allowed to reside in any part where they could show that they were proficient in their trades. To withdraw this privilege it only was necessary to construe more and more narrowly the interpretation of the term "artisan." One by one the trades of butcher, baker, manufacturer of vinegar, glazier, cook, musician, and printer were stricken from the list of those whose followers were artisans. As this policy drove back more and more of the wretched Jews from the places where they were seeking their living, the law by which they were forbidden to reside in "villages" and compelled to take up their homes within the ghettoes of the "towns" was construed more strictly and more unfairly. The result was a crowding of these unhealthy quarters that showed its necessary evil effect by the spread of phthisis, from which the Jews were formerly free, but from which they are now found, by the medical examination of the army recruits, to suffer even more than the orthodox.

In March a commission was appointed to make a searching investigation in Moscow to ascertain whether the Jews residing in its environs were bona-fide artisans. It had been decided as a preliminary measure that any artisan found unemployed was to be instantly expelled.

This is the extraordinary way in which this Russian commission executed its investigation: They simply stationed themselvs outside the houses of the Jews, and without entering one of them took the names of the dwellers and proceeded with very few exceptions to declare that they were unemployed.

Such injustice may seem incredible, but it is a fact. A Jewish tailor, seeing these inquisitors outside his house, went out and besought them to come in and see his workmen at their toil, that they might be exempted as activly employed. The commissioners refused, and entered the names upon the list of those to be expelled.

After going through this form of investigation in the city of Moscow, they continued the same in the Moscow district, allowing a few to remain here and there to carry out the idea of a discrimination based upon the principles supposed to regulate their inquiry. Such is the justice that obtains in Holy Russia.

The New York Sun provides this piece of news:

"Russkiya Viedomosti of Moscow has received the 'second warning' from the censor for 'publishing disquieting reports about the hunger in Russia.' Tolstoi's letter which appeared in that paper was the cause of the rebuke. The existence of this most liberal and thoughtful paper in the dominion of the czar now hangs on a thread, as the 'third warning' from the censor is followed by a decree to stop the publication."

This suggests to us to lay before our readers some account of the press Censorship of Russia. That there exists one need scarcely be told to a person who bears in mind that Christianity is omnipotent there and who also has read enough history to be aware that there never existed a land where that religion had power in which thought was allowed any freedom of expression. Conformably, the Russian press is under absolute censorial supervision. It consequently can rarely giv expression to opinion unless that opinion happens to coincide with the views of the government and the church. Any infringement of the press laws is, by the strict letter of the law, punishable according to the degree of the offense by the following penalties, viz.:

1. "Cautions" published in the Official Gazette.
2. Suspension for a certain period of time.
3. Prohibition to insert advertisements or sell by retail.
4. Total suppression.

It must not, however, be supposed that the list of penalties already given exhausts the armory of weapons at the disposal of the minister of the interior, and which he and his subordinates can and do wield, in order to keep the press in due submission and order. It is in many cases far more advisable to worry an obnoxious journal out of existence than to decree its suppression in the Official Gazette. By a series of vexatious and absurd restrictions, of provisional suspensions, of prohibitions to insert advertisements, or to sell by retail in the streets, and other persecutions, the carrying on of a journal can soon be rendered impossible, and this is found to be a much quieter and safer plan. The daily provincial press, indeed, may be said to hav to a great extent disappeared under this course of treatment, inasmuch as among the journals which hav one after another given up the struggle and been worried out of existence were some of the most influential and important which the country possessed. Another favorit expedient of the government is to forbid a newspaper to write any articles, or even to make any comments at all, upon the very measures and topics which the journal was founded to advocate and discuss. Thus, a journal founded with the express object of defending Jewish interests, etc., would be prohibited from making any allusion whatever to the Jewish question. Again, a paper whose raison d'être was well known to be the discussion of internal reforms, would be forbidden, perhaps, to touch in any way upon domestic subjects. Once more—in the case of a provincial journal, the plan was sometimes resorted to of appointing a special censor for it who resided at a great distance from the place where the paper was published, perhaps even at the other end of the empire.

The definition of the scope of the Censure put forward with all needful clearness in the fourteenth volume of that hell of good intentions called, "The Complete Collection of Russian Laws," is as comprehensiv as the most tyrannical autocrat could well desire. "Its function is to scrutinize all productions of literature, science, and art destined to be circulated in the empire, with the exception of such as are expressly exempted from preventiv censure," which, indeed, are also scrutinized and judged with the same unbending rigor. This paradox is quite on a par with the statement of the Connaught clodhopper sent to see whether all the pigs were come home, to the effect that he was not quite sure as to their number; he had counted them all except one mottled pig with a curly tail, that kept running about in such a bewildering way that the wit of man could not count him. The Censure deserves to be regarded as an all-important factor in the history of Russian civilization, a sort of serpent-like Nithhöggr, gnawing away at the threefold root of modern culture—literature, art, and science. Striking out successivly in every direction, it contrives to hedge in thought in all its forms, crushing out every normal manifestation of healthy moral and intellectual life, and suppressing with the same ruthlessness a play, a picture, and a private letter. It would be impossible to point to any branch of science, art, or literature on which the Censure has not left deep and abiding traces of its nefarious influence, stunting it in its growth, and warping it from its appointed goal.

E. B. Lanin, the accomplished traveler whose personal observations of Russian affairs, communicated to the London Fortnightly Review, made a very considerable stir, informs us that the Censure does not hesitate to concern itself with papers and books on subjects that would seem the most foreign to its purposes. Not a printed thing is there, on a subject however harmless, that is not pried into and maimed and confounded by this all-domineering bureau. No Censor would dispense himself from reading professionally a cookery book on the flimsy pretext that the bearing of the culinary art upon Russian autocracy is so shadowy and remote that an error of judgment in estimating it would prove comparativly harmless. On the contrary, he would first analyze the work from a purely political point of view, and then pass it on to the medical censure, where the hygienic truths it contains would be sifted and winnowed from the heresies, and, the suggested changes having been made by the author, sanctioned for publication. If Lenten fare were descanted upon to any considerable extent, the work would most probably be also submitted to the ecclesiastical censure, whose deliberations are invariably characterized by incredible slowness. A book on logarithms or conic sections, or a treatis on medicin written in Singhalese or Celtic, or any other tongue of which no subject of the czar has an inkling, would, an uninitiated person might suppose, be wholly dispensed from the time-consuming formalities of the Censure Office. This, however, is not the case. The Censure in Russia is as universal as death; no book can escape it; and more than one purely mathematical work has been suffocated before it saw the light, owing to the disordered fancy of a harassed official. Should a special treatis of this kind contain a sentence in the preface or a footnote alluding to the enlightenment of the emperor or his father or grandfather, it would, after having been examined in the ordinary way, be handed over to the minister of the court, who would take counsel as to whether the allusion should stand or the work be allowed to appear. "How dare you allow a ribald scribbler to lampoon my imperial ancestors?" said the czar to the Head of the Censure a few months ago, alluding to an erudite history of Catherine the Great. A book that touches even incidentally upon marriage or burial, a saint or a ceremony, after issuing from the ordeal of the general censure must run the gauntlet of the ecclesiastical inquisition; a tragedy or comedy has to be scrutinized by the general censure, the dramatic censure, and then, according to the range of subjects incidentally touched upon, by the ecclesiastical, military, or other appropriate departments; a work on finance—say, Professor Jevons's book on money—would hav to pass through the censure of the ministry of finances; and a biography upon Russian contemporary celebrities would hav to be first sanctioned by all or nearly all of these various censures, and then by every dignitary and every influential writer mentioned in the work. Some works that pass out of three or four such ordeals unscathed are condemned in the last, and either wholly annihilated or placed in one of the pigeon-holes of the archives in Theater street—a storeroom of unrealized ideas, wishes, plans, and projects like those with which Ariosto filled the limbo of the moon.

Besides this, private persons are not even allowed to retain undisturbed possession of such printed matter as they hav. Mr. Lanin relates:

"Thus the law ordains that all books and papers in the possession of strangers or nativs crossing the Russian frontier be taken from them and forwarded to the Censure Committee of the nearest city, which may be hundreds of miles distant from the traveler's destination; and the circumstance that these are well-known Russian works, published in the empire and bearing the imprimatur of the Censure on the flyleaf, is not enough to censure their exemption from this costly and irritating formality. It is only fair to say that even to this rule there are some exceptions: 'A foreigner has the right to take with him one note-book, one almanac, one small dictionary, one album, and one keepsake,' if, in addition to other negativ characteristics, to be verified at the custom-house, they are found to contain nothing subversiv of morality and are not of a religious or political character. Rubinstein's musical manuscripts were taken from him in this way, as they aroused the suspicions of the officials, and the Censure in the fulness of time either confiscated or lost them. The maestro never saw them any more. A traveler who should take his Encyclopedia Britannica with him would probably be annoyed to see himself deprived of it on the frontier, and exasperated to find, on receiving it back, that hundreds of paragraphs had been blackened with printer's ink, and scores of pages cut out in a most slovenly manner."

This writer describes one of the ramifications of this gigantic tyranny thus:

"The Censure Laws depend largely for their efficacy upon the complete control exercised by the government over printing offices, type foundries, booksellers' shops, circulating libraries, and all cognate trades and callings in the empire; and the most analytical of German professors would gape in admiration at the wonderful minuteness and thoroughness of this control. None of the above-mentioned establishments can be opened without a very special authorization which it is a herculean labor to obtain. A most searching inquiry is invariably made into the antecedents of the applicant, the sins and backslidings of fathers being visited upon sons and daughters, and the imprudence of the children recoiling upon their parents. When the permission is finally obtained, the heavy responsibility that goes with it, the galling restrictions that fetter the successful applicant, and his helpless dependence in business matters upon a number of venal officials devoid of scruples of any kind, is sufficient to crush out whatever enterprise he may hav been originally endowed with. Every new printing-machine, every set of type bought, sold, or repaired, every book or pamphlet destined to be printed, must be first announced to the authorities, verified by them, next entered in detail in a number of books, and then sent to the Censure for examination. If a printer gets one of his presses altered and neglects to notify the fact to the authorities, he is fined five hundred roubles, besides being visited with other and more serious pains and penalties."

All the details of the machinery by which the Russian czars, nobles, officials, and clergy stifle the complaints of their victims, cannot appear here. We will afford one more paragraph from Lanin:

"It would be difficult to imagin a code of regulations more childishly pedantic, more wantonly irksome than the three hundred and six paragraphs of which the Censure Laws are composed, which, comprehensiv though they are, constitute but the warp of the web, the woof being made up of secret instructions and galling prohibitions which would seem positivly ludicrous to a Chinaman and oppressiv to a Turk. Editors are frequently summoned by letter, as members of Parliament are by a three-line whip, and enter the council chamber in Theater street in fear and trembling, uncertain whether they hav not committed an inexpiable crime, the wages of which is literary death. There they listen in silence to the High Priest of public morality, who reads out a list of topics to which they must under no circumstances allude—the emigration to Brazil, perhaps, the migrations of peasants in Russia, the famin in various districts of the interior, the frequent cases of armed resistance to the authorities, the drunken brawl between Prince X. and Count Y. at Cubat's on the Grand Morskaïa, the flight of T.'s wife, the movements of the czar, Tolstoï's 'Kreutzer Sonata,' and a dozen others."

In a previous paper we described the wretched agricultural status of Russia, and the resulting famin; we also touched on the epidemics and other ills. In the present article we hav spoken of the religious persecution and the censure of the press. Now, we wish every reader to reflect, and bring it home to his mind, that these disasters and oppressions flow, most of them wholly, and all largely, from the religion of Christianity, and a resolute combating of that faith is the sole defense of this and every other land against them in all their horrors. We must be unremitting in our contention against religion, against hierarchism, against state domineering, and against restriction of the press. Let none think that such lesser manifestations of these evils as we hav in this country can safely be passed over. Oppression intrudes and liberty falls back by gradual and unnoted paces. And to see what the final result is, behold the appalling spectacle of Russia.

If any of our readers hav a copy of D. M. Bennett's "Thirty Discussions" which they do not want they can find a purchaser by addressing this office.

We are requested to say that Ella E. Gibson has been prostrated for several weeks with heart failure and unable to answer correspondents or transact any business. The Moralist will be continued under another proprietorship.

L. De Witt Griswold, of Elmira, N. Y., has printed an essay on "Church and Civilization," being a rejoinder to the editor of the Church News, of Woodhull, N. Y., relativ to the history of the Christian church, its establishment, career, its influence on civilization, its false doctrins, opposition to science, persecutions, and its present conspiracy to rule the country. It is a forcible document and a few stamps sent to the author for copies will not be wasted.

We hope every reader on the Pacific Coast will pay especial heed to S. P. Putnam's call for the annual Convention of the California State Liberal Union, printed in this issue, and make arrangements to attend the meeting. The work to be done is of the utmost importance, and should not be neglected. Let California take its place among the redeemed states of the West. Theoretically, it is a secular state; practically, it is allied to the church. Let the Liberals change this, as Mr. Putnam suggests in the call.

The New York Advertiser has found a new line of distinction for that Universal Man, Colonel Ingersoll. The colonel, it says, "is known to be a versatil genius, but probably few of the thousands who admire him as an orator, a lawyer, and a statesman know that he has another accomplishment which he rates above everything else. 'Any man,' said the genial colonel at a dinner the other day, 'can be a fair lawyer if he has a fair amount of brains and is willing to work; there are plenty of orators to supply the demand for them, andpoliticians are a drug in the market. I am not unduly elated by whatever success I hav achieved in these lines, but there is one thing I do pride myself on—I can cook mushrooms better than any man on earth. To develop the latent possibilities of the mushroom is the highest of the arts, and I claim to be its greatest exponent.' The eminent counsel who were present applauded, and Colonel Ingersoll invited them all to attend a little supper at his house at an early date, at which he offered to make good his claims or subscribe to the creed of the Presbyterian church."

The Kansas Blade thinks that in "thanking Almighty God for his escape from the dynamiter's bomb," Russell Sage was giving credit where credit was not due. Mr. Sage was saved from death by reason of his clerk being between him and the point of explosion. If it was "God's work," says the Blade, it was poor work for a God. His son Jesus did not show that partiality for the rich. One of his most commendable acts was to "scourge the rich money-loaners" with "a cat-o'-nine-tails," or something like it. His associates were the "poor and lowly," not the wealthy and opulent.

One of the subjects discussed at a recent Catholic congress in this city was "how to reach Infidels and Agnostics," with a view to their conversion. But none of the orators suggested that the best way was to go and see them and reason with them. The clergy prefer to fight Infidelity at long range; they can hit their men of straw without harm to themselvs, and there is less danger of their getting into controversial difficulties. But if the Catholic clergy really mean business in this matter the editor of this paper offers himself as an object for missionary effort for Archbishop Corrigan. We will debate the subject with him if he wishes, and if he can convince us that he knows what he is talking about we will join his church.

Lectures and Meetings.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S present lecture appointments are as follows: January 17th, Massillon, O.; 18th, Alliance; 19th and 20th, Canal Dover; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MANHATTAN LIBERAL CLUB meets every Friday evening at 8 o'clock in German Masonic Hall, No. 220 East 15th street, New York: January 15th—The Study of Applied Sociology, Dr. R. G. Eccles; January 22d—Theosophy, W. Q. Judge; January 29th—Thomas Paine (anniversary address), Moncure D. Conway.

THE Ohio Liberal Society, of Cincinnati, has leased the well-known and commodious hall known as the Douglass Hall, N.W. Cor. Sixth and Walnut, and will occupy it for regular Sunday evening meetings. The exercises at these meetings will consist of a lecture, occupying about one hour, followed by criticism and discussion. The following are the lecturers and their subjects for the remainder of January: January 17th—C. P. Spaulding, "Evolution and Progression;" January 24th—George Collins, "Buddha and Christ," with readings from Buddhist scriptures; January 31st—Prof. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas City, Mo., "The Sunday Question."

THE Freethinkers of Portage county, O., will hold a series of meetings in honor of Thos. Paine at the Opera House, Kent, O., beginning Sunday, Jan. 24, 392, at 2 P.M. Program: Music, lectures, discussion, and lifting of the debt incurred in adding the last fifty volumes to our library. Brother Charlesworth generously set the ball rolling by giving his services one evening—a noble example to others who make a living or profit out of the spread of the Secular philosophy. It is hoped that our brethren within reach will help us by their presence, and visiting friends will find a hearty welcome with the members. By order of the ex. committee Kent Secular Union—Ira Marsh, Jos. Heighton, L. G. Reed, Geo. W. Andrews, M. H. Heighton; H. W. Doncaster, manager; M. Heighton, secretary.

J. E. REMSBURG is now on a tour East. He expects to giv from one to three lectures in each of the following towns: Highland, Ill.; Grant Fork, Ill.; Litchfield, Ill.; Raymond, Ill.; Gillespie, Ill.; Virden, Ill.; Lorain, Ill.; Springfield, Ill.; Rock Island, Ill.; Elwood, Ill.; Arrowsmith, Ill.; Minier, Ill.; Ridge Farm, Ill.; Roodhouse, Ill.; Paris, Ill.; Olney, Ill.; Centralia, Ill.; Hillsboro, Ill.; Strasburgh, Ill.; DuQuoin, Ill.; Rensellaer, Ind.; Fort Wayne, Ind.; Dillsboro, Ind.; Vevay, Ind.; Henderson, Ky.; Clyde, O.; Lexington, O.; Alliance, O.; Orangeville, O.; Shreve, O.; Farmdale, O.; McConnelsville, O.; Sidney, O.; Huntington, W. Va.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Butler, Pa.; Russell, Pa.; Benton, Pa.; Newmanstown, Pa.; Norristown, Pa.; Knoxville, Pa.; Lockport, N. Y.; Ithaca, N. Y.; Constantia, N. Y.; Saratoga, N. Y.; New York, N. Y.; Lancaster, N. H.; Lincoln, Me.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.

OF THE

California State Liberal Union,

AT UNION SQUARE HALL,

421 POST STREET, - - SAN FRANCISCO,

January 30 and 31, 1892,

TO OPEN AT 10 O'CLOCK SATURDAY MORNING WITH BUSINESS SESSION.

To the Members and Friends of the Union, Citizens of California: The convention to be held this year is one of great importance. Standing as we do on the platform of civil and religious liberty, grave dangers confront us. Both in California and throughout the nation there is call to immediate action.

Determined efforts are being made for the enactment of a Sabbath law in California. Defeated at the last session of the legislature, the enemies of a liberal and rational observance of the Sunday are conspiring for a more strenuous effort in favor of ecclesiastical legislation, and with money and organizations, supported by the churches, are now carrying forward their campaign. Unless we are wide-awake and watchful a Sabbath law will be enforced in California, as it is now already enforced in a large number of its municipalities by local ordinances. We must understand the situation, arouse our forces and prepare for action. The issue is forced upon us, and we cannot avoid it.

In regard to the World's Fair, there is need of vigorous work. Never has the church made a more desperate endeavor to place its heel upon American institutions. It wants to run the World's Fair for the benefit of its religions and priests—to make it a church fair, instead of a World's Fair. Councils and conventions held in the interest of the churches hav declared for the closing of the gates on Sunday of this magnificent exhibition of art and industry. California should speak with no uncertain voice in a question of such infinit importance. To close the World's Fair on Sunday would be a union of church and state in this republic, fatal to human progress.

The Bible in schools question also demands our earnest attention. Great progress has been made in this matter, In Wisconsin, Oregon, and Washington legal decisions hav declared that the Bible is a sectarian book, and must be excluded from the public schools. We need the same decisions in California. The Bible is forced upon our schools. In Sacramento, the capital of the state, the Bible is read in the schools by order of the board of education. This is an outrage. An effort will be made to bring this matter before the courts of the state. Undoubtedly Bible-reading in the public schools is contrary to the constitution of California.

Another matter of great importance is appropriations out of the state treasury for the support of sectarian institutions. This is done in California. The Liberal tax-payer is compelled in this way to support the church, which, as Jefferson says, is "wicked and tyrannical." The following instance will illustrate the injustice of these appropriations. There is an institution in San Francisco called "The Ladies' Relief Protectiv Society." According to its constitution it is an unsectarian association, and as such secures aid from the state treasury for the support of orphans, to the extent of thousands of dollars a year. Within the last year an eminent Spiritual lecturer, Mrs. Watson, desired to adopt a little child, six years of age. She offered to this child, this "waif of humanity," a beautiful home, an opportunity for education and the care and protection of a mother. This society refused to giv Mrs. Watson the privilege of adopting this child, on the ground that she would not promis to send it regularly to an established Christian Protestant church and Sunday-school. Here was a religious test applied in the administration of a state institution. Here was a cruel act, worthy of the Dark Ages. Nothing could be said against the character of Mrs. Watson; she is known and respected throughout the state. She is a Spiritualist and a Liberal, and therefore she is denied the possession of this little child. The iron hand of ecclesiastical barbarism is put upon this orphan, and to-day it is compelled to remain in the asylum and not permitted to accept the generosity of the noble woman. And this is in the state of California, in an institution supported by all the taxpayers of California. It is an insult to the Spiritualists and Liberals of this state. All are compelled to support this institution, which for bigotry and superstition stands side by side with the Spanish Inquisition. Are the Liberals of the state so indifferent to humanity, to justice, that they will allow this act to transpire without protest?

The convention will take this matter into consideration and see if the state institutions of California are to be administered in this sectarian fashion.

Our platform has no creed—it is simply human rights. It is the immortal words of General Grant, "Keep the church and state forever separate." All Liberals of every belief—Spiritualists, Theosophists, Freethinkers, the liberal-minded Jew, the Christian who is willing to giv to others the same rights that he claims for himself—all are cordially invited to meet in this convention and aid in the triumph of justice, freedom, and equality.

Able speakers are expected to be present from all parts of the Coast. Music will be furnished by friends, and a splendid, sociable time is expected, together with work and inspiring addresses. There will be a grand Paine celebration on Friday evening, January 29th. A magnificent program will be presented in honor of one of the greatest of American citizens, who gave his life to the defense of truth and the rights of man.

The expenses of this convention and celebration will be about two hundred dollars. Will every friend who receives this circular contribute what he can, immediately? Aid this work. Every little helps. Giv something, each one. In spite of many discouragements, let us press on to glorious victory. Let us hav the grandest gathering of Liberals ever held in the state.

Answer this at the earliest possible moment. Direct all letters to my address: 101 Fifth street, San Francisco.

I hope for a generous response. If you can't come to the convention, at least help to make it a splendid success. Lend a hand.

Yours truly, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
President of the California State Liberal Union.

News and Notes.

I hav made arrangements for a series of four lectures at San Jose during the month of January in connection with the lectures to be given at San Francisco. San Jose is somewhat of a church town. It has a population of eighteen thousand and thirty-two churches. Three new churches are now being built. Fashion and power are evidently on the side of the priest. At the same time it is known that the majority of the people of San Jose are Liberals, but the most of them are indifferent to progressiv measures. A few are ready to take hold, and I hope that something will be accomplished by the present effort.

L. R. Titus has started a Liberal news-stand in one of the main thoroughfares of the city. THE TRUTH SEEKER is exhibited "as large as life," and attracts a great deal of attention. About half a dozen copies are in front of his establishment, with the illustrations in full view of the passer-by. The comments made from day to day are numerous and suggestiv. Mr. Titus says that it is both amusing and instructiv to hear what people say as they glance at the pictures, especially the orthodox crowd. A discussion is almost sure to take place, and of course these circles of agitation do great good. Mr. Titus keeps all sorts of Liberal books, and finds an increasing sale. A news-stand of this sort is one of the most effectiv means of advancing Freethought. Mr. Titus has the courage of his convictions, and in this enterprise has made a bold innovation that promises success. Mr. Davis, his partner, is an old newspaper man, and in every respect the business is skilfully conducted. Scientific books, modern fiction, and the journals of the day are for sale. There ought to be a Liberal news-stand in every large city.

The meetings during the coming month at San Francisco promis well. The Paine celebration and state convention will go off with colors flying, I am sure.

I am pleased with the work outlined by J. Henry Schroeder, president of Oregon Secular Union. That is the right thing, and I hope the Oregon Liberals will cooperate readily with their president in his admirable measures.

Mr. William Paden, one of the oldest Liberals in the city, died this week. The funeral services were held at the home of his daughter. Although a Liberal for over fifty years, and devoted to the cause, the services were conducted by a minister. He did not say anything about hell-fire, but he spoke of our friend as a "disciple of Jesus," which was contrary to the fact. The principles that animated the reformer were not remembered in his death. Mr. Paden was eighty-two years of age, was born in England and came to this country in 1845.

Is the Union a Refuge for Crankism?

I cut the following announcement from the Chicago Tribune of December 15th:

Anarchists, Nihilists, Mormons, and all independent thinkers and theorists who hav been formally shut out from participating in the World's Fair auxiliary congresses to be held in Chicago during the Columbian Exposition, will be asked to attend independent congresses to be held in Chicago by the American Secular Union.

C. B. Waite, president of the Union, addressed the Chicago branch last night at No. 181 West Madison street, and made the foregoing announcement.

I can hardly believe this to be true; but if it is, as a Freethinker and Secularist of a radical type I protest against it and deny the right of Mr. Waite to thus use the Secular Union to divert it from its true mission. To invite the association of professed Anarchists, law-breakers, Mormonism, free lovers, or cranky advocates of doubtful morality, under the auspices of the Secular Union, would at least smirch its true character, and by inference connect it with all the wild theories of any cranks that might put in an appearance under the banner of the Union. If the advocates of dynamite to overthrow civil order by mob-law, while the ballot-box is the refuge of our republican form of government, through which errors of government may be corrected, or the advocates of Mormonism, or free love, or the pope of Rome, who is seeking to destroy our common schools and usurp our republican form of government, desire to hold a congress during the Columbian Exposition, let them do it under their own banners; but most surely, not under the shelter of the American Secular Union. It cannot carry such a load of smirch and retain the respect of true Americans. No possible good to the cause of taxing church property or any other plank in the Nine Demands would come of such a congress of conglomeration as is proposed, that would not be far overcome by connecting or associating the distinctiv objects of the Secular Union with such a tower of Babel.

The Union already has at least half a dozen more planks in its platform than it is profitable to press to the front at present. If the whole energies of the Union could be concentrated upon the single demand for the taxation of church and parochial school property, and against any use of public money, direct or indirect, for the support of churches and sectarian education, there would be far better progress toward eventually securing some of the other eight Demands of Liberalism, which, as formulated, do not cover all the demands of a true Liberalism. But let that one Demand be fought for and won and the balance would soon fall an easy prey to justice and freedom, while at present they hang up as scarecrows to help defeat securing the one most important to enforce. By demanding the whole earth at once, it is easy to defeat getting a forty-acre homestead upon which to work for additional territory.

The justice of the single Demand for taxing all private property equally, instead of exempting a portion and forcing other property to make up the deficiency, is patent to very many in almost all the Protestant churches; but some of the others as formulated to make up the Nine Demands of Liberalism act as scarecrows to neutralize their activity to secure what they know to be just in the one Demand. They would willingly take the one, but to ask them to swallow the whole compound decoction to secure the one they want is more than they can stand, and hence they are neutral, idle converts. This much as to individuals. And it is well known that the Adventists, now a large and growing and influential denomination, are advocates of this one plank. It is also well known that the large orthodox Baptist church favors church taxation as a principle of justice. In fact, on several different occasions it has made a clear utterance for this principle. But while half a dozen other planks which they are not quite strong enough to indorse stare them in the face, it is not reasonable to expect cordial and activ coöperation with the Union. So also a very large number outside of all churches, but leaning upon them for popularity, favor taxation, but are not self-reliant enough to openly bear the taint of Liberalism toward which so many are gradually but surely drifting. Hence they remain a virtually negativ force, while the Nine Demands are all kept to the front to invite opposition to the all-important one, which so many evidently favor.

When Gettysburg and Antietam are won, the final victory is virtually won.

Will not Secularists think of these things and conclude to accept a slice to giv them strength to secure a whole loaf?

It will be no credit to the Secular Union nor the cause it distinctivly stands for, to invite and mingle with Anarchists and Mormons, and all of the wild-eyed cranks of this decade. A contact with such will be sure to leave a taint that will not easily be eradicated, if such elements are invited to come under its flag and into its tent for a love-feast in the name of the Secular Union. It cannot afford, even by implication, to giv credence to the vagaries of Dr. Cyrus Teed, of Chicago; the "Koreshen" new "messiah;" nor to Dr. Schweinfurth, the "messiah" of Rockford, Ill., and their "heavens" with other men's wives and deluded women as companion "angels," nor to other newly discovered and incarnated "Jesuses" that abound in this age of fanaticism, bigotry, and superstition. I cannot believe that a man of Mr. Waite's reputation and reputed learning ever made such an announcement in the name of the American Secular Union. He surely had no authority to do so.

Shawano, Wis., Dec. 26, 1891. W. S. Wood.

A Letter From Mr. Heywood.

Dear Mr. Macdonald: In a second letter from my Washington correspondent, he writes again, as follows:

Executiv Mansion, Nov. 19, 1891.

I see no reason for interfering with this sentence. That there was a violation of law is clear, and the sentence is not extreme. The prisoner maintains his right to do what the law denominates crime, and none of the reasons suggesting a pardon are present. His health is referred to, but no sufficient evidence that it is in a failing condition is offered. Denied. (Signed.) Benj. Harrison.

Since Nov. 2, 1877, fourteen years ago, the United States government, per the intermeddling nose of Tony Comstock, has tried to "edit" our Princeton publications. In all the cases, of which this is the fifth, I hav been given to understand that if I would accept "corrected copy" all would be easy. In the state case, before Judge Aldrich, District-Attorney Blackmer said: "All I want is to hav the business of distributing such tracts and papers stopped; if Mr. Heywood will agree to stop, and stop at once, that is the end of it" (Worcester Gazette, Nov. 2, 1883).

Aldrich granted my motion for continuance, the case went over (meanwhile God very kindly removed Blackmer, he died) and came up before Judge Pitman, May, 1884, who did not aspire or perspire to "edit" us, and so quashed the indictment. President Harrison's offer to "edit" the Word is not accepted. The right to print and deliver (by mail or otherwise) reform newspapers to regular subscribers in these States (now temporarily abolished by the Republican party) is not to be surrendered by me at least. Neither in this case or any previous ones hav I ever signed a petition for "pardon;" Mr. Harrison's letters should be sent not to me but to the headquarters of remonstrance, E. B. Foote, Jr., secretary National Defense Association, 120 Lexington avenue, N. Y., whence the petitions issued, and were signed by many good men and women not quite ready to obey "spotting," "decoy," fraud, and violence as "law." Were Mr. Harrison president of the people, or even of a party, rather than president of fraud and violence, as he is, he would know (and hasten to act accordingly) that I hav violated no law. My action was not only within the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, but sanctioned by the rulings of Devens, Nelson, Pitman, Paul, Stearns—all exponents of law worth quoting—in previous cases. Deacon Gregory, the Princeton postmaster, said to L. V. Pinney, May 27, 1890: "My orders from Washington are, not to giv any opinion on matter offered by the Heywoods, until a copy is deposited for mailing!" That is, citizens are required to commit the offense in even trying to find out what is mailable! Mr. Pinney said, "I can't walk into that trap," and hence, of course, could not continue to assist us in the publishing business; so my family, by the murderous, utterly illegal "order," hav been robbed not only of my presence and services but of their main means of subsistence now nineteen months. For weeks Deacon Gregory had been lying to us. He received papers, charged postage, and thereby agreed to forward them, but did not forward them. Mr. Harrison either can not or will not look at the facts of the case; as I told the court: "It will ultimately be seen that I am the only person in this amazing transaction who has not violated law." As to whether the sentence is "extreme," it is the severest, with one exception, that has been imposed on any person in twenty years. As to "health," the president, like Inquisition doctors, stands by, watch in hand, to see how much torture a man can bear and not die—torture for doing his duty too well for personal or family comfort!

A Worcester man robbed a bank in Dakota of $25,000; Senator Hoar signed the petition for his pardon, and Mr. Harrison released him at once. Hon. John E. Russell, of Leicester, wrote me last winter, "It is a mean fear of the Comstock organization that keeps you in prison; only two or three more names were needed on the petition to hav released you long ago." The Worcester Spy, August 8th, said, "Large numbers of influential people hav signed the petition, but it lacks the names of influential local persons, because Mr. Heywood will not"—promis to be good. These local persons, responsible, as the Spy says, for the continuance of this great wrong, are, curiously enough, two Republican relations of mine, viz., Senator Hoar, a distant cousin, and my rich brother, S. R. Heywood, who foreclosed a mortgage and put my family on the street in 1878, and pursued us by suits and executions ten years; it is these two men, who conspired with Comstock and Deacon Gregory, who rejoice in their cruel power to inflict suffering, and stand coolly by and say to Judge Carpenter, "Sock it to him, your honor." It is all for morality's sake, Christ's sake, and the votes it fetches. But, whether I physically survive this or not, there is a day after to-day, and the people will erelong hav nothing but execration for power to do wrong now called "law."

As to censorship, I want light relativ to how and by whom it is done in Boston. In a resolution previously written for the meeting in Paine Hall, November 15th, it was stated that the Anarchists "were guilty of no overt act against life or property." In the resolutions as offered by Mr. Tucker, and printed in Liberty, the word "property" is omitted. In 1887 Mr. Tucker printed the falsehood that the Anarchists had "invaded life and property;" he now, by implication, repeats one-half of that lie, by voice and type. Can you tell me who expurgated and thereby falsified that resolution? A. H. Simpson and Carl Freide were prominent in the doings of that meeting; are they so far gone in "philosophical Anarchism" that they cannot tell the truth about the Chicago martyrs? You see I am "in pursuit of knowledge under difficulties." Again, all the talk was about cases years ago, and one thousand miles away; not a word for liberty suppressed in Boston and New York to-day; rather it is Chaseville, not Boston, a suburb of Comstockville, once known as New York; and yet John Most, greater than Lafayette, braver than Kosciusko, is in prison for free speech! When Phillips and Pillsbury spoke local, present wrong was denounced; we got the latest news in their eloquent wrath.

When Jefferson was inaugurated president in 1801 he spoke as a plain citizen saying, "We are all republicans and all democrats; it is for me to assure liberty to all." His life, as written by James Parton, shows intelligence, sight and strength to do right. Ingersoll says, "Men are rightly judged by the use they make of their power." Mr. Harrison makes history and cannot escape his record; as for myself, I hav no words to unsay or steps to retrace. Citizenship implies life, nerve to insist that others suffer no detriment; those who silently acquiesce in wrong show loss of faith, and even of the consciousness of their own perfidy. Thanks that so many are insurgent, that more and more women revolt. Activ love of truth, hot wrath, will burn up the cobweb statutes in which big bottle spiders, the president, the senator, now fatten on the life of innocent, useful persons.

Ingersoll Appears As a Prophet.

The New York Herald says that from time immemorial prophecy, though often unheeded, has always been harkened to, and the religious, political, and weather prophets hav been the seers in most constant popular demand. Accordingly that paper has collected prophecies on these matters by some eminent men, among the rest one by Colonel Ingersoll on religion. The paper says: "There is one big law office in New York where the clerks do not appear to be in a state between suspense and suspension like a condemned criminal or a prankish college student. This is the office illumined by the ready smile of the big smooth face of Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is at No. 45 Wall street, and there Colonel Ingersoll put himself on the witness-stand and thus prophesied to his stenographer, who laughed as he noted the colonel's deep-throated deliberate sentences. Those who believe that the edges of the popular Freethinker's heterodoxy hav been blunted by time or contact with the great minds of orthodoxy in magazine conflicts are advised to read the prophecy upside down." The interview then follows, thus:

Question—What is your prophecy as to the result of the conflict between heresy and orthodoxy in 1892?

Answer—Of course there has been a conflict between orthodoxy and heresy for many centuries.

In all Christian lands, so called, there hav always been a few whose reason was too great or too clear to be entirely extinguished by the authority of the church. I say "a few," because during many centuries an overwhelming majority hav been absolutely orthodox—that is to say, they hav accepted and believed without question.

At that time people were equally ignorant on nearly all subjects, and their ideas on all subjects were what might be called in happy accord. Their geology and astronomy were just as ignorant as their religion.

Slowly, painfully, men found out a few facts in nature, and after a time enough of these facts were gotten together to substantiate a theory in conflict with orthodox religion. Some men refused to believe (after they found the size of the earth and the velocity with which it moves) that it had been stopped in its rotary motion for twenty-four hours to giv General Joshua time to kill a few Amalekites, or some other ites; or that the earth had not only been stopped, but had actually been turned back, to convince a Jewish king that he was not going to die of a tumor. So, after a few centuries the immensity of the universe began to be comprehended, and then it looked hardly reasonable that the creator of such a universe should hav tried to get even with an Egyptian king by covering him with lice. To many quite reasonable people this seemed absurd, and it also seemed past belief that the creator of all the stars should hav miraculously preserved the knees and elbows—to say nothing of the shoes—of the clothes worn by the Israelites for forty years in the wilderness so that not a knee got shiny and all the elbows came to the promised land without a hole.

Gradually and very gradually people began to think. Of course the church, being very powerful, was very arrogant, and at first these thinkers were answered with blows, or with chains, or with fagots, and these answers were for many centuries quite sufficient. But in spite of the methods used by those who loved their enemies the number of doubters increased and they hav kept increasing year after year until now. The church kept dividing, first you may say, into Catholic and Protestant, then subdividing into all kinds of Methodists and Baptists and Presbyterians, and again subdividing into Unitarians and Universalists, until now nearly every Christian is called a heretic by some other Christian, and that other Christian gets his revenge by calling all the rest heretics.

The beauty of it all is that now the church can do but little in addition to calling names. There was a time when the charge of heresy meant persecution to the death—when it meant a public execution, imprisonment for life, the confiscation of all property. It meant that the wife should be left a widow, that the children should be left orphans not only, but should be left to starve as the tainted children of a burnt heretic. The time was when the church went so far as to dig up bodies and try the dead for heresy, and upon conviction take property from the grandchildren of the corpse and giv it to the saints. Now, as men advance in science, as they know more about astronomy and geology and chemistry, they use this information or this knowledge for the purpose of correcting or changing their religious creeds. As they become acquainted with the creeds of other nations they find that their own religion is substantiated by the same kind of foolish miracles, by the testimony of the same unknown witnesses, and in about the same way. Day by day men are losing confidence in the miraculous and gaining confidence in human reason, in human effort, in human accomplishment. So, day by day, they are turning their attention to this world instead of another. They know now that when any plague strikes the earth it is not a judgment of God, but a natural result of conditions. They know it is altogether better to wash than to pray—that there is more salvation in cleanliness than in godliness. They are beginning to learn that if the earth is to be made better, man must do it; if the poor are to be taken care of, if the innocent are to be protected, it must all be the work of man. Consequently, heresy so called—and by heresy I mean being true to yourself—is growing day by day and year by year.

I do not believe the world will go backward in 1892. Of course, if there should be a good many earthquakes, or if there should be some frightful plague, undoubtedly the ignorant would rush back to the church, to the priest, for protection—would fall upon their knees and pray to the deaf heavens, as they always hav done. But I think the time will come when men will know that the gods hav nothing to do even with earthquakes, nothing to do with the storm or the flood, and that all the time spent in asking for their assistance is wasted.

In other words, I believe that more and more man will rely on his reason, more and more on what he can do himself, and less and less on supernatural aid. I believe that heresy is going on increasing day by day until no man can make a living in the supernatural business—when nobody will submit to the payment of toll on a highway that is supposed to lead to another world—that the time is coming when every man will do his own guessing for himself. I do not mean by this that churches are to be thrown down or that preachers are to be persecuted—they are to be outgrown, and in time the places of church and priest will be taken by school and teacher.

Now, unless the whole world is going backward, the year 1892 will see a greater growth of heresy than any other year has seen.

And so I say to the world, "A happy new year"—a year with more intelligence, less superstition; with more reason, less authority; with more happiness and less fear, than any other year has known. Orthodoxy is decay, heresy is growth. Orthodoxy is the dead leaf, heresy is the bud. Heresy is the eternal dawn.

Colonel Ingersoll to the Rev. Mr. King.

From the Evening Telegram.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING TELEGRAM: The Rev. James M. King—who seems to hav taken this occasion to become known—finds fault because "blasphemous utterances concerning Christmas" were published in the Telegram, and were allowed "to greet the eyes of innocent children and pure women."

How is it possible to blaspheme a day? One day is not, in and of itself, holier than another—that is to say, two equal spaces of time are substantially alike. We call a day "good" or "bad," according to what happens in the day. A day filled with happiness, with kind words, with noble deeds, is a good day. A day filled with misfortunes and anger and misery we call a bad day. But how is it possible to blaspheme a day?

A man may, or may not, believe that Christ was born on the 25th of December, and yet he may fill that day, so far as he is concerned, with good thoughts, and words, and deeds. Another may really believe that Christ was born on that day, and yet do his worst to make all his friends unhappy. But how can the rights of what are called "clean families" be violated by reading the honest opinions of others as to whether Christmas is kept in honor of the birth of Christ, or in honor of the triumph of the sun over the hosts of darkness? Are Christian families so weak intellectually that they cannot bear to hear the other side? Or is their case so weak that the slightest evidence overthrows it? Why do all these ministers insist that it is ill-bred to even raise a question as to the truth of the improbable, or as to the improbability of the impossible?

A minister says to me that I am going to hell—that I am bound to be punished forever and ever—and thereupon I say to him: "There is no hell; you are mistaken; your Bible is not inspired; no human being is to suffer agony forever;" and thereupon, with an injured look, he asks me this question: "Why do you hurt my feelings?" It does not occur to him that I hav the slightest right to object to his sentence of eternal grief.

MANY THOUSANDS DIFFER.

Does the gentleman imagin that true men and pure women cannot differ from him? There are many thousands of people who love and honor the memory of Jesus Christ who yet hav not the slightest belief in his divine origin, and who do not for one moment imagin that he was other than a good and heroic man. And there are thousands of people who admire the character of Jesus Christ who do not believe that he ever existed—who admire the character of Christ as they admire Imogen, or Perdita, not believing that any of the characters mentioned actually lived.

And it may be well enough here to state that no human being hates any really good man or good woman—that is, no human being hates a man known to be good—a woman known to be pure and good. No human being hates a lovable character.

It is perfectly easy for anyone with the slightest imagination to understand how other people differ from him. I do not attribute a bad motiv to a man simply because he disagrees with me. I do not say that a man is a Christian, or a Mohammedan, "for revenue only." I do not say that a man joins the Democratic party simply for office, or that he marches with the Republicans simply for position. I am willing to hear his reasons—with his motivs I hav nothing to do.

Mr. King imagins that I hav denounced Christianity "for revenue only." Is he willing to admit that we hav drifted so far from orthodox religion that the way to make money is to denounce Christianity? I can hardly believe, for joy, that liberty of thought has advanced so far. I regret exceedingly that there is not an absolute foundation for his remark. I am indeed sorry that it is possible in this world of ours for any human being to make a living out of the ignorance and fear of his fellowmen. Still, it givs me great hope for the future to read, even in this ignorant present, that there is one man, and that man myself, who advocates human liberty—the absolute enfranchisement of the soul—and does it "for revenue"—because this charge is such a splendid compliment to my fellowmen.

IN HARMONY WITH THE AGE.

Possibly the remarks of the Rev. Mr. King will be gratifying to the Telegram and will satisfy that brave and progressiv sheet that it is in harmony with the intelligence of the age.

My opinion is that the Telegram will receive the praise of enlightened and generous people.

Personally, I judge a man not so much by his theories as by his practice, and I would much rather meet on the desert—were I about to perish for want of water—a Mohammedan who would giv me a drink than a Christian who would not; because, after all is said and done, we are compelled to judge people by their actions.

I do not know what takes place in the invisible world called the brain, inhabited by the invisible something called the mind. All that takes place there is invisible and soundless. This mind, hidden in this brain, masked by flesh, remains forever unseen, and the only evidence we can possibly hav as to what occurs in that world we obtain from the actions of the man, of the woman. By these actions we judge of the character, of the soul. So I make up my mind as to whether a man is good or bad, not by his theories, but by his actions.

WHAT IS BLASPHEMY?

Under no circumstances can the expression of an honest opinion, couched in becoming language, amount to blasphemy. And right here it may be well enough to inquire:—What is blasphemy?

A man who knowingly assaults the true, who knowingly endeavors to stain the pure, who knowingly maligns the good and noble, is a blasphemer. A man who deserts the truth because it is unpopular, is a blasphemer. He who runs with the hounds knowing that the hare is in the right, is a blasphemer.

In the soul of every man, or in the temple inhabited by the soul, there is one niche in which can be found the statue of the ideal. In the presence of this statue, the good man worships—the bad man blasphemes—that is to say, he is not true to the ideal.

A man who slanders a pure woman or an honest man, is a blasphemer. So, too, a man who does not giv the honest transcript of his mind, is a blasphemer. If a man really thinks the character of Jehovah, as portrayed in the Old Testament, is good, and he denounces Jehovah as bad, he is a blasphemer. If he really believes that the character of Jehovah, as portrayed in the Old Testament, is bad, and he pronounces it good, he is a blasphemer and a coward.

All laws against "blasphemy" hav been passed by the numerically strong and the intellectually weak. These laws hav been passed by those who, finding no help in logic, appealed to the legislature.

Back of all this superstition you will find some self-interest. I do not say that this is true in every case, but I do say that if priests had not been fond of mutton, lambs would never hav been sacrificed to God. Nothing was ever carried to the temple that the priest could not use, and it always so happened that God wanted what his agents liked.

"REVENUE" AND RELIGION.

Now I will not say that all priests hav been priests "for revenue only," but I must say that the history of the world tends to show that the sacerdotal class prefer revenue without religion, to religion without revenue.

I am much obliged to the Rev. Mr. King for admitting that an Infidel has a right to publish his views at his own expense, and with the utmost cheerfulness I accord that right to a Christian. The only thing I hav ever objected to is the publication of his views at the expense of others.

I cannot admit, however, that the ideas contained in what is known as the Christmas Sermon are "revolting to a vast majority of the people who giv character to the community in which we liv." I suppose that a very large majority of men and women who disagree with me are perfectly satisfied that I hav the right to disagree with them, and that I do not disagree with them to any greater degree than they disagree with me. And I also imagin that a very large majority of intelligent people are perfectly willing to hear the other side.

OPINIONS NOT EXOTICS.

I do not regard religious opinions, or political opinions, as exotics that hav to be kept under glass, protected from the frosts of common sense, or the tyrannous north wind of logic. Such plants are hardly worth preserving. They certainly ought to be hardy enough to stand the climate of free discussion, and, if they cannot, the sooner they die the better.

I do not think there was anything blasphemous or impure in the words published by the Telegram. The most that can possibly be said against them, calculated to excite the prejudice of Christians, is that they were true—that they cannot be answered except by abuse.

It is not possible, in this day and generation, to stay the rising flood of intellectual freedom by keeping the names of thinkers out of print. The church has had the field for eighteen hundred years. For most of this time it has held the sword and purse of the world. For many centuries it controled colleges and universities and schools. It had within its gift wealth and honor. It held the keys, so far as this world is concerned, of heaven and hell—that is to say, of prosperity and misfortune. It pursued its enemies even to the grave. It reddened the scaffold with the best blood, and kept the sword of persecution wet for many centuries. Thousands and thousands hav died in its dungeons. Millions of reputations hav been blasted by its slanders. It has made millions of widows and orphans, and it has not only ruled this world, but it has pretended to hold the keys of eternity, and under this pretense it has sentenced countless millions to eternal flames.

At last the spirit of independence rose against its monstrous assumptions. It has been growing somewhat weaker. It has been for many years gradually losing its power. The sword of the state belongs now to the people. The partnership between altar and throne has in many countries been dissolved. The adulterous marriage of church and state has ceased to exist. Men are beginning to express their honest thoughts. In the arena where speech is free superstition is driven to the wall. Man relies more and more on the facts in nature, and the real priest is the interpreter of nature. The pulpit is losing its power. In a little while religion will take its place with astrology, with the black art, and its ministers will take rank with magicians and sleight-of-hand performers.

REV. MR. DIXON'S LETTER.

With regard to the letter of the Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., I hav but little to say.

I am glad that he believes in a free platform and a free press—that he, like Lucretia Mott, believes in "truth for authority, and not authority for truth." At the same time, I do not see how the fact that I am not a scientist has the slightest bearing upon the question—but if there is any fact that I hav avoided or misstated, then I wish that fact to be pointed out.

When we take into consideration the fact that the Rev. Mr. Dixon is a minister and believes that he is called upon to deliver to the people a divine message, I do not wonder that he makes the following assertion: "If God could choose Balaam's ass to speak a divine message, I do not see why he could not utilize the colonel." It is natural for a man to justify himself and to defend his own occupation. Mr. Dixon, however, will remember that the ass was much superior to the prophet of God, and that the argument was all on the side of the ass. And, furthermore, that the spiritual discernment of the ass far exceeded that of the prophet. It was the ass who saw the angel when the prophet's eye was dim. I suggest to the Rev. Mr. Dixon that he read the account once more and he will find:

First, That the ass first saw the angel of the Lord; second, that the prophet Balaam was cruel, unreasonable, and brutal; third, that the prophet so lost his temper that he wanted to kill the innocent ass, and the ass, not losing her temper, reasoned with the prophet and demonstrated, not only her intellectual but her moral superiority. In addition to all this the angel of the Lord had to open the eyes of the prophet—in other words, had to work a miracle, in order to make the prophet equal to the ass, and not only so, but rebuked him for his cruelty. And this same angel admitted that without any miracle whatever the ass saw him, the angel—showing the spiritual discernment of the ass in those days was far superior to that of the prophet.

I regret that the Rev. Mr. King loses his temper, and that the Rev. Mr. Dixon is not quite polite.

All of us should remember that passion clouds the judgment, and that he who seeks for victory loses sight of the cause.

And there is another thing:—He who has absolute confidence in the justice of his position can afford to be good-natured. Strength is the foundation of kindness; weakness is often malignant, and, when argument fails, passion comes to the rescue.

Let us be good-natured. Let us hav respect for the rights of each other.

The course pursued by the Telegram is worthy of all praise. It has not only been just to both sides, but it has been—as is its custom—true to the public.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

From the Evening Telegram of January 9th.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING TELEGRAM: Some of the gentlemen who hav given their ideas through the columns of the Telegram hav wandered from the subject under discussion. It may be well enough to state what is really in dispute.

I was called to account for having stated that Christianity did not bring "tidings of great joy," but a message of eternal grief—that it filled the future with fear and flame—made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, in which most of the children of men were to be imprisoned forever, and that, not satisfied with that, it had deprived God of the pardoning power.

These statements were called "mountainous lies" by the Rev. Dr. Buckley, and, because the Telegram had published the "Christmas Sermon" containing these statements, he insisted that such a paper should not be allowed in the families of Christians, or of Jews—in other words, that the Telegram should be punished, and that good people should refuse to allow that sheet to come into their homes.

It will probably be admitted by all fair-minded people that, if the orthodox creeds be true, then Christianity was, and is, the bearer of a message of eternal grief, and a large majority of the human race are to become eternal convicts, and God has deprived himself of the pardoning power. According to those creeds, no word of mercy to any of the lost can ever fall from the lips of the Infinit.

The Universalists deny that such was, or is, the real message of Christianity. They insist that all are finally to be saved. If that doctrin be true, then I admit that Christianity came with "tidings of great joy."

Personally I hav no quarrel with the Universalist church. I hav no quarrel with any creed that expresses hope for all of the human race. I find fault with no one for filling the future with joy—for dreaming splendid dreams and for uttering splendid prophecies. I do not object to Christianity because it promises heaven to a few, but because it threatens the many with perdition.

It does not seem possible to me that a God who loved men to that degree that he died that they might be saved abandons his children the moment they are dead. It seems to me that an infinit God might do something for a soul after it has reached the other world.

Is it possible that infinit wisdom can do no more than is done for a majority of souls in this world? Think of the millions born in ignorance and filth, raised in poverty and crime. Think of the millions who are only partially developed in this world. Think of the weakness of the will, of the power of passion. Think of the temptations innumerable. Think, too, of the tyranny of man, of the arrogance of wealth and position, of the sufferings of the weak—and can we then say that an infinit God has done, in this world, all that could be done for the salvation of his children? Is it not barely possible that something may be done in another world? Is there nothing left for God to do for a poor, ignorant, criminal human soul after it leaves this world? Can God do nothing except to pronounce the sentence of eternal pain?

I insist that, if the orthodox creed be true, Christianity did not come with "tidings of great joy," but that its message was, and is, one of eternal grief.

If the orthodox creed be true, the universe is a vast blunder—an infinit crime. Better, a thousand times, that every pulse of life should cease—better that all the Gods should fall palsied from their thrones, than that the creed of Christendom should be true.

All Christians should remember that facts are not sectarian, and that the sciences are not bound by the creeds. We should remember that there are no such things as Methodist mathematics, or Baptist botany, or Catholic chemistry. The sciences are secular.

The Rev. Mr. Peters seems to hav mistaken the issues—and yet, in some things, I agree with him. He is certainly right when he says that Mr. Buckley's cry to boycott the Telegram is "unmanly and un-American," but I am not certain that he is right when he says that it is un-Christian.

The church has not been in the habit of pursuing enemies with kind words and charitable deeds. To tell the truth, it has always been rather relentless. It has preached forgivness, but it has never forgiven. There is in the history of Christendom no instance where the church has extended the hand of friendship to a man who denied the truth of its creed.

There is in the church no spirit—no climate of compromise. In the nature of things there can be none, because the church claims that it is absolutely right—that there is only one road leading to heaven. It demands unconditional surrender. It will not bear contradiction. It claims to hav the absolute truth. For these reasons it cannot consistently compromise, any more than a mathematician could change the multiplication table to meet the views of some one who should deny that five times five are twenty-five.

The church does not giv its opinion—it claims to know—it demands belief. Honest, industry, generosity, count for nothing in the absence of belief. It has taught, and still teaches, that no man can reach heaven simply through good and honest deeds. It believes and teaches that the man who relies upon himself will be eternally punished—and why should the church forgiv a man whom it thinks its God is waiting somewhat impatiently to damn?

The Rev. Mr. Peters asks—and probably honestly thinks that the questions are pertinent to the issues involved—"What has Infidelity done for the world? What colleges, hospitals, and schools has it founded? What has it done for the elevation of public morals?" And he inquires what science, or art, has been originated by Infidelity. He asks how many slaves it has liberated, how many inebriates it has reclaimed, how many fallen women it has restored, and what it did for the relief of the wounded and dying soldiers; and concludes by asking what life it ever assisted to higher holiness, and what death it has ever cheered.

Although these questions hav nothing whatever to do with the matters under discussion, still it may be well enough to answer them.

It is cheerfully admitted that hospitals and asylums hav been built by Christians in Christian countries, and it is also admitted that hospitals and asylums hav been built in countries not Christian; that there were such institutions in China thousands of years before Christ was born, and that many centuries before the establishment of any orthodox church there were asylums on the banks of the Nile—asylums for the old, the poor, the infirm, asylums for the blind and for the insane, and that the Egyptians, even of those days, endeavored to cure insanity with kindness and affection. The same is true of India and probably of most ancient nations.

There has always been more or less humanity in man—more or less goodness in the human heart. So far as we know, mothers hav always loved their children. There must hav always been more good than evil, otherwise the human race would hav perished. The best things in the Christian religion came from the heart of man. Pagan lips uttered the sublimest of truths, and all ages hav been redeemed by honesty, heroism, and love.

But let me answer these questions in their order.

First: As to the schools.

It is most cheerfully admitted that the Catholics hav always been in favor of education—that is to say, of education enough to make a Catholic out of a heathen. It is also admitted that Protestants hav always been in favor of enough education to make a Protestant out of a Catholic. Many schools and many colleges hav been established for the spread of what is called the gospel, and for the education of the clergy. Presbyterians hav founded schools for the benefit of their creed. The Methodists hav established colleges for the purpose of making Methodists. The same is true of nearly all the sects. As a matter of fact, these schools hav in many important directions hindered rather than helped the cause of real education. The pupils were not taught to investigate for themselvs. They were not allowed to think. They were told that thought is dangerous. They were stuffed and crammed with creeds—with the ideas of others. Their credulity was applauded, and their curiosty condemned. If all the people had been educated in these sectarian schools, all the people would hav been far more ignorant than they are. These schools hav been, and most of them still are, the enemies of higher education, and just to the extent that they are under the control of theologians they are hindrances, and just to the extent that they hav become secularized, they hav been and are a benefit.

Our public school system is not Christian. It is secular. Yet I admit that it never could hav been established without the assistance of Christians—neither could it hav been supported without the assistance of others. But such is the value placed upon education, that people of nearly all denominations and of nearly all religions, and of nearly all opinions, for the most part agree that the children of a nation should be educated by the nation. Some religious people are opposed to these schools because they are not religious—because they do not teach some creed—but a large majority of the people stand by the public schools as they are. These schools are growing better and better, simply because they are growing less and less theological, more and more secular.

Infidelity, or Agnosticism, or Freethought, has insisted that only that should be taught in schools which somebody knows, or has good reason to believe.

The greatest professors in our colleges to-day are those who hav the least confidence in the supernatural, and the schools that stand highest in the estimation of the most intelligent are those that hav drifted farthest from the orthodox creeds. Freethought has always been, and ever must be, the friend of education. Without free thought there can be no such thing—in the highest sense—as a school. Unless the mind is free, there are no teachers, and there are no pupils, in any just and splendid sense.

The church has been, and still is, the enemy of education, because it has been in favor of intellectual slavery, and the theological schools hav been what might be called the deformitories of the human mind.

For instance: A man is graduated from an orthodox university. In this university he has studied astronomy, and yet he believes that Joshua stopped the sun. He has studied geology, and yet he asserts the truth of the Mosaic cosmogony. He has studied chemistry, and yet believes that water was turned into wine. He has been taught the ordinary theory of cause and effect, and at the same time he thoroughly believes in the miraculous multiplication of loaves and fishes. Can such an institution, with any propriety, be called a seat of learning? Can we not say of such a university what Bruno said of Oxford: "Learning is dead and Oxford is its widow?"

Year after year the religious colleges are improving—simply because they are becoming more and more secular, less and less theological. Whether Infidelity has founded universities or not, it can truthfully be said that the spirit of investigation, the spirit of free thought, the attitude of mental independence, contended for by those who are called Infidels, hav made schools useful instead of hurtful.

Can it be shown that any Infidel has ever raised his voice against education? Can there be found in the literature of free thought one line against the enlightenment of the human race? Has free thought ever endeavored to hide, or distort a fact? Has it not always appealed to the senses—to demonstration? It has not said: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear;" but it has said: He that hath brains to think, let him think.

The object of a school should be to ascertain truth in every direction, to the end that man may know the conditions of happiness—and every school should be absolutely free. No teacher should be bound by anything except a perceived fact. He should not be the slave of a creed, engaged in the business of enslaving others.

So much for schools.

Second: As to public morals.

Christianity teaches that all offenses can be forgiven. Every church unconsciously allows people to commit crimes on a credit. I do not mean by this that any church consciously advocates immorality. I most cheerfully admit that thousands and thousands of ministers are endeavoring to do good—that they are pure, self-denying men, trying to make this world better. But there is a frightful defect in their philosophy. They say to the bank cashier: "You must not steal, you must not take a dollar—larceny is wrong, it is contrary to all law, human and divine—but if you do steal every cent in the bank, God will as gladly, quickly forgiv you in Canada as he will in the United Sates." On the other hand, what is called Infidelity says: There is no being in the universe who rewards, and there is no being who punishes—every act has its consequences. If the act is good, the consequences are good; if the act is bad, the consequences are bad; and these consequences must be borne by the actor. It says to every human being: You must reap what you sow. There is no reward, there is no punishment, but there are consequences, and these consequences are the invisible and implacable police of nature. They cannot be avoided. They cannot be bribed. No power can awe them, and there is not gold enough in the world to make them pause. Even a God cannot induce them to release for one instant their victim.

This great truth is, in my judgment, the gospel of morality. If all men knew that they must inevitably bear the consequences of their own actions—if they absolutely knew that they could not injure another without injuring themselvs, the world, in my judgment, would be far better than it is.

Free thought has attacked the morality of what is called the atonement. The innocent should not suffer for the guilty, and if the innocent does suffer for the guilty, that cannot by any possibility justify the guilty. The reason a thing is wrong is because it, in some way, causes the innocent to suffer. This being the very essence of wrong, how can the suffering of innocence justify the guilty? If there be a world of joy, he who is worthy to enter that world must be willing to carry his own burdens in this.

So much for morality.

Third—as to science and art.

I do not believe that we are indebted to Christianity for any science. I do not remember that one science is mentioned in the New Testament. There is not one word, so far as I remember, about education—nothing about any science, nothing about art. The writers of the New Testament seem to hav thought that the world was about coming to an end. This world was to be sacrificed absolutely to the next. The affairs of this life were not worth speaking of. All people were exhorted to prepare at once for the other life.

The sciences hav advanced in the proportion that they did not interfere with orthodox theology. To the extent that they were supposed to interfere with theology they hav been obstructed and denounced. Astronomy was found to be inconsistent with the scriptures, and the astronomers were imprisoned and despised. Geology contradicted the Mosaic account, and the geologists were denounced and persecuted. Every step taken in astronomy was taken in spite of the church, and every fact in geology had to fight its way. The same is true as to the science of medicin. The church wished to cure disease by necromancy, by charm and prayer, and with the bones of the saints. The church wished man to rely entirely upon God—that is to say, upon the church—and not upon himself. The physician interfered with the power and prosperity of the priest, and those who appealed to physicians were denounced as lacking faith in God. This state of things existed even in Old Testament times. A king failed to send for the prophets, but sent for a physician, and then comes this piece of grim humor: "And Asa slept with his fathers."

The great names in science are not those of recognized saints.

Bruno, one of the greatest and bravest of men—greatest of all martyrs—perished at the stake, because he insisted on the existence of other worlds and taught the astronomy of Galileo.

Humboldt—in some respects the wisest man known to the scientific world—denied the existence of the supernatural and "the truths of revealed religion," and yet he revolutionized the thought of his day and left a legacy of intellectual glory to the race.

Darwin—greatest of scientists—so great, that our time will probably be known as "Darwin's Century," had not the slightest confidence in any possible phase of the so-called supernatural. This great man left the creed of Christendom without a foundation. He brought as witnesses against the inspiration of the scriptures such a multitude of facts, such an overwhelming amount of testimony, that it seems impossible to me that any unprejudiced man can, after hearing the testimony, remain a believer in evangelical religion. He accomplished more than all the schools, colleges, and universities that Christianity has founded. He revolutionized the philosophy of the civilized world.

The writers who hav done most for science hav been the most bitterly opposed by the church. There is hardly a valuable book in the libraries of the world that cannot be found on the "Index Expurgatorius." Kant and Fichte and Spinoza were far above and beyond the orthodox world. Voltaire did more for freedom than any other man, and yet the church denounced him with a fury amounting to insanity—called him an Atheist, although he believed not only in God, but in special providence. He was opposed to the church—that is to say, opposed to slavery, and for that reason he was despised.

And what shall I say of D'Holbach, of Hume, of Buckle, of Draper, of Haeckel, of Büchner, of Tyndall, and Huxley, of Auguste Comte, and hundreds of thousands of others who hav filled the scientific world with light and the heart of man with love and kindness?

It may be well enough, in regard to art, to say that Christianity is indebted to Greece and Rome for its highest conceptions, and it may be well to add that for many centuries Christianity did the best it could to destroy the priceless marbles of Greece and Rome. A few were buried, and in that way were saved from Christian fury.

The same is true of the literature of the classic world. A few fragments were rescued, and these became the seeds of modern literature. A few statues were preserved, and they are to-day models for all the world.

Of course it will be admitted that there is much art in Christian lands, because, in spite of the creeds, Christians, so-called, hav turned their attention to this world. They hav beautified their homes, they hav endeavored to clothe themselvs in purple and fine linen. They hav not been forced from banquets, or from luxury, by the difficulty of camels going through the eyes of needles, or the impossibility of carrying water to the rich man. They hav cultivated this world, and the arts hav lived. Did they obey the precepts that they find in their sacred writings, there would be no art, they would "take no thought for the morrow," they would "consider the lilies of the field."

Fourth: As to the liberation of slaves.

It was exceedingly unfortunate for the Rev. Mr. Peters that he spoke of slavery. The Bible upholds human slavery—white slavery. The Bible was quoted by all slaveholders and slavetraders. The man who went to Africa to steal women and children took the Bible with him. He planted himself firmly on the word of God. As Whittier says of Whitfield:

> He bade the slave ship speed from coast to coast,
> Fanned by the wings of the Holy Ghost.

So, when the poor wretches were sold to the planters, the planters defended their action by reading the Bible. When a poor woman was sold, her children torn from her breast, the auction-block on which she stood was the Bible; the auctioneer who sold her quoted the scriptures; the man who bought her repeated the quotations, and the ministers from the pulpit said to the weeping woman, as her child was carried away: "Servants, be obedient unto your masters."

Free thinkers in all ages hav been opposed to slavery. Thomas Paine did more for human liberty than any other man who ever stood upon the Western world. The first article he ever wrote in this country was one against the institution of slavery. Free thinkers hav also been in favor of free bodies. Free thinkers hav always said "free hands," and the Infidels, the wide world over, hav been friends of freedom.

Fifth: As to the reclamation of inebriates.

Much has been said, and for many years, on the subject of temperance—much has been uttered by priests and laymen—and yet there seems to be a subtle relation between rum and religion. Scotland is extremely orthodox, yet it is not extremely temperate. England is nothing if not religious, and London is, par excellence, the Christian city of the world, and yet it is the most intemperate. The Mohammedans—followers of a false prophet—do not drink.

Sixth: As to the humanity of Infidelity.

Can it be said that people hav cared for the wounded and dying only because they were orthodox? Is it not true that religion, in its efforts to propagate the creed of forgivness by the sword, has caused the death of more than one hundred and fifty millions of human beings? Is it not true that where the church has cared for one orphan it has created hundreds? Can Christianity afford to speak of war?

The Christian nations of the world to-day are armed against each other. In Europe, all that can be gathered by taxation—all that can be borrowed by pledging the prosperity of the future—the labor of those yet unborn—is used for the purpose of keeping Christians in the field, to the end that they may destroy other Christians, or at least prevent other Christians from destroying them. Europe is covered with churches and fortifications, with temples and with forts—hundreds of thousands of priests, millions of soldiers, countless Bibles, and countless bayonets—and that whole country is oppressed and impoverished for the purpose of carrying on war. The people hav become deformed by labor, and yet Christianity boasts of peace.

Seventh: "And what death has Infidelity ever cheered?"

Is it possible for the orthodox Christian to cheer the dying, when the dying is told that there is a world of eternal pain, and that he, unless he has been forgiven, is to be an eternal convict? Will it cheer him to know that even if he is to be saved, countless millions are to be lost? Is it possible for the Christian religion to put a smile upon the face of death?

On the other hand, what is called Infidelity says to the dying;—What happens to you, will happen to all. If there be another world, of joy, it is for all. If there is another life, every human being will hav the eternal opportunity of doing right—the eternal opportunity to liv, to reform, to enjoy. There is no monster in the sky. There is no Moloch who delights in the agony of his children. These frightful things are savage dreams.

Infidelity puts out the fires of hell with the tears of pity.

Infidelity puts the seven-hued arch of hope over every grave.

Let us then, gentlemen, come back to the real questions under discussion. Let us not wander away.

Wants a Colony of Liberals.

RICHMOND, WASH., Dec. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please send me information regarding the American colony of Liberals located near La Lagoa, Mexico, or send me the name of the secretary or some one connected with the colony who would giv me the desired information on application? A. L. RUDES.

[There is no colony of Liberals in Mexico. Some of the members of the Sinaloa Socialistic colony at La Logia, Mexico, are Liberals. Information in regard to the colony may be had of the Credit Foncier Co., 32 Nassau street, New York, but we should advise people to go very slow in investing cash in or joining the colony.—ED. T. TOLEDO, O., Dec. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $2 for a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," which please send me. I am a constant reader of your valuable paper. I get it through a newsdealer here, and after reading pass it around where it will do most good. I hav been here only one year, but hav sown some Liberal seed. I expect to send you two subscribers 1st of January. This city is a hotbed of orthodoxy. The priest and the preacher work harmoniously together and pool the receipts. The consequence is, they are fat and sleek and arrogant. I wish I could induce some good Liberal to deliver a lecture here, to get Freethought started on a sure basis. I will contribute $10 to that end. W. WINTER.

How Much Are We Robbed?

CATES, IND., Dec. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of your paper I remember there was mention of what Grant said as to the amount of church property in the United States. Now, as we hav in our neighborhood a man who lectures considerably, and at times on the taxation of all private property, and that, too, on a graduated scale, and says he should like much to hav such text on the matter as you are able to furnish, will you please publish as complete and full an article on the subject as you can, giving what Grant, Garfield, and others hav said, with reference to book, page, etc., where the same may be found, and oblige,

J. H. VANSICKLE.

The Magnet Didn't Magnetize These Men.

MADISON, GA., Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Here is the answer below of the editor of the Medical Record, New York, to a correspondent inquiring about the Georgia Magnet. How an intelligent Infidel can giv credence to such an absurd pretension, can be only accounted for upon the principle of the credulity of the mind. There are scarcely any absurd things that do not find believers.

A. A. BELL, M.D.

MAGNETIC GIRLS.—A correspondent asks us how and when the tricks of the "Georgia Magnet" were exposed. The only magnetic girl who ventured to giv exhibitions in this city was a Miss Hurst. It was abundantly shown at the time that her apparent feats of strength were due to sudden, quick, and dexterous movements on the lady's part. The subjects operated upon were taken off their guard, and were really made to help in the apparent exhibitions of strength.

Thinks Us the Best Workers.

Jan. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In spite of a so-called national Secular organization, the only effectiv agitation so far has been carried on by your efforts. You hav done more than a dozen such organizations could hav done. Now, after hundreds of societies all over the country hav put themselvs on record in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays, the American Secular Union has at last concluded to call a mass-meeting for such purpose. Instead of leading it has tardily lagged behind; instead of firing on the picket line it has gone to sleep on post. Is such an organization capable of inspiring confidence? Will this one meeting compare with the work already accomplished? In the past I hav contributed a good many dollars to its treasury; in the future I shall let it do something before paying for promises.

Inclosed find $1 toward paying for the printing of your excellent letter to Congressmen. Send me a few of them and you will hear from me again.

Freethinkers should try to put their money where it will do some good. No organization can do as good work as THE TRUTH SEEKER. With a happy new year for Macdonald and Heston, A.

MAGNET, MO., Dec. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5, for which put me ahead one year, and send tracts as requested in subscription blank. I would willingly giv some one the benefit of the subscription price; but they are afraid to investigate for themselvs. The majority want a prop to lean on. They do not seem to think they could be men without some sky-pilot to intercede for them and a devil to frighten them. You will see by my address that I hav changed my residence from Kansas to Magnet, Mo. They seem to take to superstition more readily here than in my neighborhood in Kansas. They are having a revival here at present. By the way, one of my brothers is a member of this flock, and has been a punctual contributor. I hav been reasoning with him for seven years. He is getting quite Liberal. Two sky-pilots got word he was imbibing Infidelity. They came to see him a few days past to untangle their brother and reconcile the contradictions in the old fable. I was there when they came. We had a right interesting time for two hours. I made two quotations from the Bible which they denied flat-footed. They were these: 1. That Solomon was the wisest man that ever came on the earth, or that would come after him. 2. "Bring hither mine enemies that would not that I should rule over them, and slay them before me." I am confident I hav read these quotations in the Holy Queer. Drop me a card where I can find the quotations and whether I am right or wrong. I wish to tackle them right in their dens, while their powwow is at its hight. Accept my thanks for the light I hav received from that noble paper THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will pay for it and read it as long as I liv.

The Eagle Will Scream for Liberty.

LEWISTOWN, MONT., Dec. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 and a clipping from a Helena paper, which indicates there is one brave newspaper in Montana that dare publish its convictions against Puritanism.

Fraternally, W. H. CULVER.

The attempts of the Helena authorities to foist Puritanism upon its inhabitants show a deplorable lack of common sense. The New Northwest will always be found on the side of morality, order, and the observance of civil laws. It will, on the other hand, be the champion of liberty, when that liberty does not interfere with the happiness and well-being of others. What we refer to is the action recently taken in regard to closing the opera house Sunday nights. In our ignorance we supposed that this was a free country; that the pursuit of happiness was one of our inalienable rights, and that no dictator should point out the way to pursue it so long as our actions are harmless. It is too late in the world's history for the toleration of bigotry—people can no longer be burnt at the stake or fried on hot gridirons for not accepting a creed. There are zealots who might like to drive people into church at the point of a bayonet, but free Americans will scarcely submit to such tyranny.

Let us consider this case for a moment. Helena, considering its size, has a large floating population. It is well known that strangers in a city for a day or two do not hunt up a church, even if they belong to a church-going sect. Suppose the day to be Sunday, and the supper, or late dinner, as the case may be, to be over at the hotels; what is the stranger to do with his evening? There are plenty of places running wide open—saloons and gambling-houses and far worse places of resort which the authorities hav made no attempt to close. Here all the allurements of vice await him; the vicious of both sexes are waiting to take him in. On the other hand, to be sure, there are the churches; but a large percentage of traveling people never go to church under any circumstances. Between these two there is the opera house, with good music, a clean play, or a light opera. The place is light and warm, the stranger can rest and be amused until it is so late that he is willing to return to his hotel to sleep, unless he is a hopeless night-hawk.

Helena strains at a gnat and swallows a camel. Well, let her swallow him, hump and all. She will find that the people of Montana want no Puritan village for the state capital. We are not ready to adopt any Blue laws or burn any witches. Our state is too broad and too grand, too high up in the free air, for bigotry; and the Rocky mountain eagle intends to scream and shriek for liberty as long as he has a feather to his back or a wing to his body.

Thanks for Your Prayers, bnt Wonld Rather Hav Your Investigation.

MONTREAL, CAN., Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav before me a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 26th. I am acquainted with many Freethinkers in Montreal, all excellent men in many respects. I am a believer in Christianity as taught by Christ and his Apostles, but I do not acknowledge that Christianity is responsible for the wild deeds of men who were only wolves in sheep's clothing. One of the things that surprise me to-day is the strange attitude of the churches toward Freethinkers. I always notice that secular papers contain only one side of the question. I presume that as fair-minded men who profess to be seeking after the truth you will allow something to be said in your paper in defense of Christianity. In all my experience with Freethinkers I find that it is not Christianity that they are attacking at all, but the counterfeit of Christianity. The men and system which you condemn were the very same kind of men and system that crucified Christ. It was not unbelievers and Freethinkers that crucified Christ, but the scribes and the Pharisees, who professed to be believers in the Bible. Let me giv you a short description of Christianity. Pontius Pilate said he found no fault with Christ and he wished to set him free. Huxley and Ingersoll say the same thing. Come with me for a little while back to the life of Christ. Behold him as a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He had not where to lay his head. How different from the pope of Rome and his cardinals, bishops, and archbishops. How different from the archbishop of Canterbury or the moderator of the Presbyterian general assembly or the president of the Methodist conference. Behold him going among the poor and despised classes of his day, sympathizing with them and comforting them in their sorrows. Look at him teaching those who flocked around him in the open air the following precepts: "Whatsoever ye would that others should do to you do ye so likewise unto them." "Love [even] your enemies," he tells them. He was despised and rejected by the rulers and the regular church-going people of that day because he healed a man on the Sabbath day. The so-called great lights of Montreal find fault with me because I do not ignore the Freethinkers as they do. There is something in Christianity that outsiders cannot understand. Even as Christ himself prayed for those who crucified him because they did not know what they were doing, so I pray for you that you may see Christ as I see him, the fairest of ten thousand and the altogether lovely. I could say a great deal more but I hav said enough if it will only be for the wastebasket.

Lincoln a Spiritualist.

Dec. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Speaking of a recent book by Mrs. Maynard claiming that Lincoln was a Spiritualist and attended séances at which she was the medium, Mr. H. Wettstein in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 7th ridicules the claim and says:

"The fraud would hav been apparent even if Mr. Nicolay had not exposed it, for it is not at all likely that a quarter of a century would hav passed before Spiritualists had utilized the report that Lincoln attended séances if there was any truth in it."

In this Mr. Wettstein intends to convey the idea that this claim is a recent invention of Spiritualists, never before heard of by them. In this he displays a wonderful ignorance or a malignant prejudice, because the claim was made public more than a quarter of a century ago in Spiritualistic papers and has several times been stated in other papers since then. And it is certain that the story was privately current and believed among leading intelligent Spiritualists during Lincoln's lifetime, as some now living can truthfully testify. That it was not blazoned to the public at that time was because of the embarrassment it would hav wrought to Mr. Lincoln and the Union cause on account of the prejudice existing against Spiritualism among the masses when the president was bending all efforts to retain the confidence and support of the loyal people—even to the extent of using some expressions in his proclamations and public utterances that giv some plausibility after his death to the claim that he was at least a quasi indorser of the popular features of modern creeds and dogmas of Christianity, while his most intimate and lifelong friends knew that he was what is anathematized as an "Infidel" or a "Freethinker." The power of Christian bigotry, prejudice, and intolerance is so potent that had it been generally known that he was attending Spiritual séances and was a believer in the philosophy, a portion of even loyal Christians would hav withheld a portion of their support and confidence, while he was fighting not only the armed enemy in the South but also the semi-disloyalty that was cropping out in the North against his prosecution of the war to save the Union. I hav not seen Mrs. Maynard's book, but even the "exposè" by Nicolay as in the papers is an admission that Lincoln did attend séances and giv some attention to the subject "out of curiosity," so that his denial that Lincoln was a Spiritualist because he did not tell Nicolay so amounts to nothing, only to advertise the latter's prejudices. Church News Breezily Written.

HARTFORD, KAN., Dec. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you what the Campbellites are doing. Last year they got an evangelist named Hall to come here. Hall was a shrewd man and a great talker, claimed to stand second only to Clark Braden in his church, but when challenged to debate with an Adventist named Long from northwestern Missouri he flew the track. The Adventists could never get him to set a time when he would meet their champion. Nevertheless, Mr. Hall, with the help of a broken-up congregation in the country, succeeded in building up a membership of eighty here in the city, and got them to purchase a church building belonging to the trustees of a defunct Evangelical association. This fall and winter another evangelist named Cook made his appearance and began another revival, which continued five weeks and resulted in the accession of eighty more members.

Cook is a rather young-looking man, of small size both of body and brain, lantern-jawed, apelike forehead, and ears resembling a donkey. He did not attempt to prove anything he said except from the Bible, and used that very sparingly. I heard him say in one of his sermons that "the question is not, Is the Bible true? or, Does science sustain the Bible? but, Supposing there is a possible heaven to gain and a possible hell to shun, which is the safest way?" And he pursued that line of argument (?) all the way through his five weeks' preaching. He did not hav much to say about Infidels except to ask occasionally what they had done for this country, and what had become of their prophecies concerning the downfall of Christianity. I tried to get an opportunity to answer these questions in the newspapers, but the privilege was denied me. Toward the close of the meetings I found time to extract the choice meat from twelv or thirteen late TRUTH SEEKERS for the benefit of my notebook and then hand the papers around. The Adventists hav a missionary-box at the depot and I occasionally put a TRUTH SEEKER in it. I find that they disappear much more rapidly than religious literature, and I can discover no evidence of their destruction.

On one occasion when there was a baptizing ceremony last month at the "pool" in the Campbellite church, it was told afterward by a lady member that a virgin was baptized at the critical period which happens about once a month and the effects thereof were discernible. The Holy Ghost was doubtless there on the occasion, for he knew when to visit Sarah, Mary, Elizabeth, and Samuel's mother. And, behold, the Virgin Nellie was baptized first with the other women and afterward the men, and the Holy Ghost was present, and the blood of the everlasting covenant was in the water.

Whenever anyone was taken into the pool the choir sang about the flowing fountain; but I could see no flowing water except that which rolled down off the convert as he came out. The way to heaven is made extremely easy by these Campbellites. They even warm the water for their converts to be baptized in. Mr. Cook said there were plenty of people in the town who were good enough to go to heaven without becoming Christians, but the Bible commanded something more than goodness. It required faith and baptism, and there was no other name given under heaven or among men whereby anyone could be saved. They got nearly a score of the hardest rakes in the community, and I'll be damned if I don't believe that some of them needed something more than their honesty and virtue to save them. It would be a tough request to ask me to call some of them brothers without seeing some restitution going on, but now they are bloodwashed or whitewashed into respectability, while I am one the pious can scarcely pray for without a shudder, all owing to my having my brains located in that very unfortunate place above my shoulders. A. H. DARROW.

King Solomon's Temple Demolished.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: For the dimensions of the temple we refer to 1 Kings vi, 2, which says, "And the house which King Solomon built for the Lord, the length thereof was three score cubits, and the breadth thereof was twenty cubits, and the hight thereof was thirty cubits." Historians disagree slightly as regards the exact length of a cubit. Smith's Bible Dictionary says 18 inches; Josephus, 21 inches; others, as low as 17 inches; but none over 21 inches. Taking the longest length of 21 inches to a cubit, we find Solomon's temple to be 105 feet long, 35 feet wide, and 52½ feet high.

For its size it was a very expensiv building. Some idea can be formed by reading what David gave his son Solomon for the decoration of the temple. 1 Chron. xxii, 14, says: "Now, behold, in my trouble I hav prepared for the house of the Lord one hundred thousand talents of gold, and one million talents of silver, and of brass and iron without weight, for it is in abundance; timber also and stone hav I prepared, and thou mayest add thereto." There seem to be different opinions as to the proper value of a talent of gold and silver. Josephus givs the value of a talent of gold at $3,240, and talent of silver at $1,875. On this basis, 100,000 talents of gold would amount to $324,000,000, and 1,000,000 talents of silver would amount to $1,875,000,000, which added together make the enormous sum of $2,199,000,000. Now, we must remember that this is the smallest value placed on a talent of gold. Many writers claim a talent of gold to be worth $25,000, and a talent of silver $1,666. Calmet, "a man of great learning, and an acknowledged authority on such matters," claims that a talent of gold is worth $26,608, and a talent of silver $1,500. On this basis 100,000 talents of gold would be worth $2,660,800,000, and 1,000,000 talents of silver would amount to $1,500,000,000, which added together amount to $4,160,800,000. In addition to this amount David gave 3,000 talents of gold and 7,000 talents of silver, which added together amount to $90,324,000. In addition to this also the chief of the tribes of Israel gave 5,000 talents of gold and 10,000 talents of silver. This gift amounts to $148,040,000 (1 Chron. xxix, 4-7). By adding these three donations together, we reach the grand total of $4,399,164,000, all of which was used for the ornamentation of the temple. Ames's Encyclopedia says a talent of gold is worth $28,375, and a talent of silver is valued at $1,980. On this basis the grand total amounts to $5,078,160,000. After erecting a building the size of the temple, "allowing the side walls, front walls, and roof two feet thick of solid silver," making no allowance for doors and windows, there yet remains a balance of over $1,500,000,000 worth of silver. Then, after overlaying the entire interior of the building with gold one inch thick, we hav left over $2,500,000,000 of gold. Webster's Dictionary says a talent of gold is equal to 93¾ lbs. avoirdupois. A little figuring shows us that 108,000 talents of gold would weigh 50.62½ tons, and would load 506 freight cars. F. R. and C. R. Conder, in the "Hand-Book of the Bible," say a talent of gold is worth $26,280 and a talent of silver $1,642.50, and a cubit is 18 inches. The revised edition of the "Manual of Biblical Geography," by Rev. J. L. Hurlbut, D.D., acknowledges these figures to be correct. On this basis, the temple would be but 90 feet long by 30 wide. McCay, "a writer of many valuable works on Freemasonry," says in his "Cyclopedia and Dictionary of Freemasonry," page 338: "Masonic writers hav wasted much time in useless and pueril conjecture in regard to the wages paid to the artists and artisans who were employed in the construction of Solomon's temple. English writers place the sum at about $15,000,000, and Dr. A. G. Mackey thinks that about $4,000,000,000 were expended for labor and materials. A little reflection will show the unreasonableness of these estimates. A structure like that of the temple could not cost $4,000,000,000. All the monarchies of that age could not hav raised, by the severest system of taxation, one-tenth part of four billions, and that the Jewish people, a poor and feeble race of shepherds and rude agriculturists, could raise such an enormous sum to expend on one public work is impossible. The richest modern nation could not do it, and it may be doubted whether all modern nations could." Many more authorities might be quoted, but we consider the foregoing sufficient. Can anyone be found to-day who believes that over $4,000,000,000 were used for the ornamentation of one small building, a building similar to that of the temple? "Allowing the side walls, front walls, and roof to be two feet thick, making no allowance for doors and windows," it would contain but 34,822 cubic feet. We find that the silver alone contains over 160,000 cubic feet, hence after building the walls and roof of solid silver two feet thick there remains over 125,000 cubic feet of silver. Let us compare the temple with modern undertakings. The entire cost of thirty of the costliest canals in the United States and Canada was but $101,000,283, or one-fortieth of the value of gold and silver used in the temple. The capital stock of all the railroads in the United States in the year 1888 was but $3,999,508,508. The entire amount of gold and silver mined in the United States from and including the year 1849, until the year 1888, was but $2,376,583,720, or less than one-half the gold and silver used on King Solomon's temple. The whole amount appropriated by Congress "for all purposes" for the years 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887 was only $1,329,673,438, or less than one-third of the gold and silver used on Solomon's temple. Taking the above facts into consideration, we are led to the conclusion that King Solomon, his temple, and the donations are myths, born in the imagination, and never had any foundation in fact. Eloquent Exposition of Infidelism.

BRADFORD, PA., Dec. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: My last article in your valuable journal stung to the quick some of my esteemed orthodox friends. They look at me in astonishment and are afraid to associate with me, in terror of the wrath to be doled out in the future by his infinit Lordship, Mr. God. They tell me some horrible accident will some day overtake me for making light of holy things—for hurting the feelings of the sanctimonious followers of the lamb—for saying that God could no more giv us the dimensions of space than I could, or make something out of nothing. Amongst my good friends are three or four gentlemen on the shady side of life, pretty well descended into the vale of years. They ask me, "Do you expect to die like the dumb brute of the field, without any hope of a continuity of life?" And to these good fellows I say, "Well, not exactly as the dumb brute, but as the honest man, as the humanitarian, as the well-wisher of everything good to every worthy 'man, woman, and child.'" And as to a continuity of life I hav but little hope, and that little is so small that I do not think it will ever come to a point large enough to make a speck that can be found with a microscope. Of what use could we be in an eternal life? Tell me how it can be possible we should inherit an eternal existence. Could we be of any use to anybody? To help God? No. Why? Because if there is such a being as that described it is conditionless, and you can do it no evil nor can you do it any good. Therefore let us giv ourselvs no uneasiness about it in any way, shape, or manner.

Now, then, to make myself perfectly plain upon this question, let us refer to the question of predestination—one of the strong points of the church. They tell me that long ages before anything was created this being that is so darkly wrapped in the folds of mystery planned the career and destiny of every being and animal in the universe, and knew exactly what they would do and under what circumstances they would do it. Now, then, if this be so (and here the question arises, for one instant no sane man ever thought it was): If we are predestined to go to hell, what is the use of going to churches? We must of necessity go there. And, on the other hand, if we are to go to heaven we are going there nevertheless, in spite of creeds and dogmas, and no devil can allure us into his fold, nor stop nor stay us. Our ticket is made out for heaven or hell, as the case may be, and we take our passage from the cradle through life, through the dark and yawning tunnel of death, over troubled seas of imaginary waters, to the final resting-place of his sooty majesty, Professor Mahound, or to the golden gates of everlasting joy. To anyone having hopes of everlasting happiness we now nor never had any objection. But for anybody entertaining expectations of eternal torture here we raise the standard of revolt. If God made you, it was not to be a sufferer in the regions of eternal pain. Banish these infernal ideas forever from your minds. They are only intended to be taught to wild beasts. Take all the comforts that there are in this life out of it, not forgetting to extend the same privilege to your neighbor at the same time. Be perfectly honest on all subjects and only advocate as far as your knowledge leads you, and when you follow a life from the cradle to the grave there let it rest and say in honesty and in all candor: We leave it here. We know no further. At the portals of the tomb, and beyond them, as far as we know, no sorrow, no harrowing pain, no ill nor evil, awaits the loved ones. And as for the truly honest, on all subjects relativ to the question of destiny let us say, The situation affords no evidence, and if we offer any opinions the chances are we might be wrong. And in the presence of all this let us be patient and await the results, and when we get there, to my mind we will hav the same privilege to behave ourselvs there as we did here. Let us giv our absolute attention to this world and the relations we sustain to one another. Use your fellow-man as you would like to be used by others. Do not beat your wife and children, and after being at church and partaking of the body and blood of Christ go home and throw them out into the street in the storm and all kinds of inclement weather. Rather hav a home on the humane principle. The poet Burns had a good idea of how to conduct a well-regulated home—

> To make a happy fireside clime
> For weans and wife
> Is the true pathos and sublime
> Of human life.

This sentiment ought to adorn the walls of every Christian home.

I candidly ask, Why should we sacrifice the happiness and comforts of this life for the promised bliss of one we know not of? For the present one we hav had to manufacture an experience to suit the occasion, and when we arrive at another life—if we ever do, and as for me I do not wish to—we shall hav the same opportunity to accumulate it there as we did here. I do not nor would not ask nor expect any such an after existence as some of our leading Christians want, viz., examining the wounds in Christ's hands and feet and turning alternately and taking a peep at the millions writhing in the throes of eternal agony in hades, and be happy, too, in this kind of employment.

Expectancy, thou art truly kind to the ever hopeful. What a blessing that only one man or woman in every three entertains such blessed hopes! The rest of us get along nicely without these ennobling influences. Notwithstanding, we use all alike. This comes under the head of "faith," that blind, eyeless entity so prevalent in Christians' minds. I believe that Paul, as he is now known—formerly Saul of Tarsus, the great Infidel—defined faith, and this definition has brought it down to our times intact: "The evidence of things not seen, the assurance of things hoped for." I might state here while I am passing that Paul knew just about as much on that subject as we do now, no more and no less. If anything we hav the advantage of the early Christians as far as knowledge is concerned. This I am absolutely sure of, and, this in our possession, we laugh at the absurd ideas held by Paul and all his contemporaries. Knowledge is power to the skeptic; ignorance is bliss to the follower.

I hav always said, and I say now to my special orthodox opponents (this term is not real, only descriptiv): "Come over amongst us and now and then enjoy the pleasure of a free, hearty laugh. Feel good. Be sociable. Shake hands with a 'glad to meet you' expression. Come and bring your family over with you and stay over Sunday along with us. We hav long disputed about creeds and such, but of course you know the human family is outgrowing all that kind of thing now, particularly since we hav had the public school system started in our country. Of course the folks in the old countries are still persecuting the opposers of the Christian system, you know, but that is hardly a reason for us in this splendid country to quarrel over such vague absurdities. However, be sure and come over. Mother would like to get acquainted with you folks. She has heard so much about your being so amiable and pleasing, she wants to see you and hav a talk with you. I hav heard her say more than once that her father and mother used to tell her never as long as she lived to read Tom Paine's books or associate with Infidels, and all that kind of thing, but you know the old people at the present are more enlightened than they used to be in the days when our ancestors shifted the scenes on life's busy stage—more in sympathy with light and liberty—think more of this life than their ancestors did—in fact, getting more Liberal and getting more in touch with educational development, and so on. You understand what I mean; cannot explain myself very good, you know, but I am reading some heretic and Infidel books lately, and of course we will understand each other in a little while. Glad we hav met. Be sure and come and" etc., etc. JAS. SPELLEN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Song for Bedtime.

A little song for bedtime,
When, robed in gowns of white,
All sleepy little children
Set sail across the night
For that pleasant, pleasant country
Where the pretty dream-flowers blow,
'Twixt the sunset and the sunrise,
For the Slumber Islands, ho!

When the little ones get drowsy
And the heavy lids drop down
To hide blue eyes and black eyes,
Gray eyes and eyes of brown;
A thousand boats from dreamland
Are waiting in a row,
And the ferrymen are calling
For the Slumber Islands, ho!

Then the sleepy little children
Fill the boats along the shore,
And go sailing off to Dreamland;
And the dipping of the oar
In the sea of sleep makes music
That the children only know
When they answer to the boatman's
For the Slumber Islands, ho!

Oh, take a kiss, my darlings,
Ere you sail away from me
In the boat of dreams that's waiting
To bear you o'er the sea;
Take a kiss and giv one,
And then away you go
A-sailing into Dreamland,
For the Slumber Islands, ho!

—Charles Kiely Shetterly in Boston Courier.

Chestnut Trees.

I address these few lines to the children in the Corner. They will think none the less of them for coming from an old baby past his three score and ten. He who has been twice a child certainly has more experience than the first edition of God's image and likeness.

I wish to tell my remembrance of five chestnut trees that stood almost three hundred yards from the spot where I was born the 1st of January, 1818. I think I must hav been about four years old when I began to take an activ part in the picking chestnuts business in connection with my brothers and sisters. I was no silent partner. Well, we were all pretty activ from the time we scrambled out of bed, treading on one another's nightgowns, which always seemed too long for easy working, until the last chestnut that had dropped in the night was gathered.

These trees were very old seventy years ago. Each stood just far enough from the other that the nuts did not mix; no two were alike; the chestnut from each tree had its identity. The chestnuts on one tree would ripen two weeks earlier than those on the latest. While all were of a fair size, one tree was a special favorit.

Can anything be more beautiful than the chestnut on its dropping from its nest—its rich, lively, lustrous brown, comparing with the delicate white tints where it was attached to the parent burr which had sheltered it through the summer until the frost of September would compel it to drop its nurseling to the ground, which was the bone of contention with me and my little brothers and sisters. "Going up to the chestnut tree," was a familiar phrase. I hear its ring now. How often I would come to my mother and declare my foot was full of chestnut trees, for I could not stop to put on my shoes in my haste to be first at the tree. My mother would make coffee from the chestnuts for Thanksgiving morning every year; no coffee seemed like it. I seem to hav its exquisit flavor, perfumery, at this moment as much as when I held out my little mug at the breakfast table and demanded more, when my brother and sisters would look up to my mother in blank surprise, and say, in deprecating tones, "Georgie wants more!" Nevertheless, I always got it. Well, not one of these trees is in existence now. They gave up their vitality from pure old age. I did not see them come, but I lived to see them go, as I did my father and mother, brothers and sisters, and soon I will go where sleep is dreamless—to nourish other chestnut trees, perhaps. But never mind; what would we do if vitality had no end? It is pleasant to hav a grandfather and grandmother, and perhaps, now and then, a great-grandfather and great-grandmother, but it could hardly be pleasant to go back of these last.

Good-bye, little ones; be as happy as you can, and to be happy is to be useful.

A happy new year.

The Asphalt Lake of Trinidad.

Dear Young Friends: This lake is situated on the southwestern side of the island of Trinidad at no great distance from the strait known as the "Serpent's Mouth," which connects the gulf of Paria with the Atlantic ocean, whose waters wash the southern and eastern shores of Trinidad. At this point the neighboring continent of South America is distant only by a few miles of water. In an almost direct line with the Serpent's Mouth, the Orinoco flows into the gulf of Paria through its different mouths.

This lake, which is really an extensiv plain covered with bitumen or pitch, is perhaps one of the most extraordinary phenomena which is to be witnessed in the world. Situated in the district of La Brea, it lies about a mile inland from the low shore of the village of La Brea and about forty miles distant from Port-of-Spain.

A comfortable little steamer leaves Port-of-Spain, our capital, twice a week in the morning, and returns in the evening, thereby affording every opportunity to visitors to the island of seeing the lake, and one which, I think, ought not to be neglected.

The voyage going and coming he will find amusing and interesting. Amusing from the strange and mixed assemblage on board, mostly coolies and Chinese shopkeepers (carying on business in the small settlements along the coast), all neatly attired in their picturesque costumes. Alongside of them sits the industrious negro "marchande" or huckster, chattering or quarreling away, with her basket of fruits and vegetables for the San Fernando market, and no less an interesting character on board is the captain, who is as black as a coal, and who makes it a point never to refuse a drink when offered one. One has the opportunity of seeing from the steamboat some of the richest sugar plantations that exist. The first place touched by the steamer is San Fernando, a town of considerable importance and the center of the sugar industry of the Naparimas, next to Port-of-Spain as a commercial port.

After a very short stay the steamer steers for La Brea, and from this all along the coast. As the steamer slowly glides along its course a close observer will notice a change in the appearance of the soil on the beach, for at certain points it is of a much darker appearance than the soil as seen up at San Fernando.

The steamer stops opposit to the village of La Brea, and the passengers are sent ashore in boats. If the tide is high it is all right, but if the tide is low the landing is carried on the boatmen's backs—strong, sturdy negroes. If one, as sometimes happens, is a good heavyweight, and the one who bears him a little weak, a grand theatrical performance is presented free of charge.

On making the landing at La Brea, indications appear denoting what is to follow: Pitch here, pitch there, and pitch everywhere, and as the boat nears the shore she floats over a pitchy bottom, imparting a dismal hue of gloom to the surrounding waters.

Having been landed, the next difficulty will be to get to the lake about a mile distant, and here in the terrible heat that arises from all sides around him, for his very feet are burning as he stands on the half-softened pitch, the poor visitor might well feel dismayed. If it is a cool day, cool by rain having fallen the previous night, and small slight drizzles during your voyage, it is all very well, for it is more pleasant then to walk than to be at the mercies of carts and horses.

The road to the lake is a broad one, covered with a thick layer of asphaltum, and on both sides may be observed large deposits of pitch which are being dug, and which form part of the descending streams of pitch from the lake that hav moved down slowly after the manner of semi-fluid lava in motion for ages past. It is skirted by rich tropical plants, low palms, and numerous creepers. The appearance of the country is, for the most part, uncultivated, with the exception of a few patches of cassava and some corn.

The lake itself is surrounded on all sides by a forest of wood and low jungle growing with all the freshness and luxuriance of a new vegetation on virgin soil. The entire surface is pitch, a plain of pitch, most irregular in its outlines, expanding and narrowing, so that it is difficult to hav a just idea of its extent and form.

Pools of water round and clear can be seen here and there resting on its surface, which, on examination, will be found to be mostly fresh water, probably rain-water which has not had time to evaporate, or land-water in part that may hav flowed from the neighboring thicket. Patches of green grass on the black surface closely cling to a little dark soil that has been collected in cracks and crevices of the pitch. Lastly, and certainly the most striking feature, are little groves scattered in this pitchy desert exhibiting all the luxuriance of tropical vegetation — the favorit haunt of the tiny little hummingbirds and the noisy parrots.

Standing on the brink of this lake, one cannot but exclaim: "This is indeed an extraordinary work of nature." Once is sufficient to it. When once seen one does not care to see it twice, except those whose lives are thrown in and about it. H. S.

Loyal.

There are few more admirable qualities than loyalty.

To be loyal and true, faithful and constant,

To be worthy of trust, fidelity, and confidence,

To feel you hav a loyal friend who will be true to you in joy or sorrow, in adversity and affliction, is a blessing indeed;

And to feel yourself loyal to others is still better yet—to know that, let whatever come between, you will be a good, true, trusting friend and helper.

A grand and beautiful word is loyalty: and that we may all be loyal, true, and faithful to friends and to right, honor, and virtue is the hope of Aunt Elmina.

Conundrums.

What is it that makes everybody sick but those who swallow it? Answer: Flattery.

Pray tell me, ladies, if you can,
Who is that highly favored man,
Who, though he's married many a wife,
May be a bachelor all his life?
Ans.: A clergyman.

Why is a pair of skates like an apple? Ans.: They hav occasioned the fall of man.

Why is a schoolboy like knowledge itself? Ans.: He is learning.

Why do fine ladies squeezing wet linen remind us of going to church? Ans.: The belles are wringing.

Why is the sun like disorderly people? Ans.: It turns night into day.

How can the letter A be removed from the alphabet? Ans.: By B-heading it.

Why is an avaricious man like one with a short memory? Ans.: He is always for getting.

Why is coffee like an ore? Ans.: It should be ground before using.

In what month do ladies talk the least? Ans.: February.

What kind of snuff is that, the more you take of it the fuller the box will be? Ans.: Candle-snuff.

What trade is the sun? Ans.: A tanner.

Which can see better, a blind man or a man that has not eyes? Ans.: The latter, if he has one eye.

Can you make "new door" into one word? Ans.: "One word."

Why ought the stars to be the best astronomers? Ans.: Because they hav studded (studied) the heavens ever since the creation.

Why may a schoolmaster whose scholars are leaving him be certain that he cannot lose them all? Ans.: Because he always has a pupil in his eye.

Why may a man who is playing blindman's-buff be said to possess benevolent sympathies? Ans.: Because he feels for his fellow-creatures.

Why is an egg underdone like the same overdone? Ans.: Because it is hardly done.

What is that which nobody wants, yet nobody likes to lose? Ans.: A lawsuit.

Correspondence.

Hanoverton, O., Dec. 25, 1891.

Dear Miss Wixon: It is some time since I wrote to the Children's Corner, and as it is Christmas and there is nothing to go to, I thought I would write to the Children's Corner.

We are having vacation till after New Year. My teacher's name is John Brown. Christmas eve the Presbyterians had a Christmas tree, and our teacher treated his scholars at the church. I was not there. I do not go to church on any occasion, so he sent my treat to me by one of the neighbors.

I think it is too bad that they will go to the church to treat the school.

I like my teacher, but he is a member of the Disciple church, and also a member of the Junior Order.

I do not go to school till the religious exercises are over. The teacher said the one who got the most headmarks would get a prize. Ross Miller and I each had eleven marks, so teacher gave us each a quarter. He said the one that got the most headmarks would get fifty cents, and if there were two who got the same number they would each get a quarter at the end of the term.

As I am taking up too much valuable space, I will close by wishing you a happy new year. Your Liberal friend, Alice Kintner.

[Alice is a bright girl who will never be caught in the snares of superstition. Her letters are always welcome.—Ed. C. C.]

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:

Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

Virginia City, Nevada, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I hav been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, Hank White.

News of the Week.

By the end of 1892 most of the South and Central American countries will hav entered on reciprocity with us.

A Philadelphian has been killed by trying to swallow a rosary, in the belief that if he did so he would liv forever.

The Vatican and Chili will resume diplomatic relations. These were broken off while the clerical party was out of power.

Sunday opening of New York's Art Museum may be discontinued through efforts of those "conscientiously opposed" to it.

The high priests of Persia who forbade smoking in order to break up the tobacco monopoly, hav triumphed. The monopoly has been officially abolished.

The proposition to deviate from the custom of building synagogs so as to face toward Jerusalem is creating resentment among the main body of the Jews.

The latest pretended miraculous cures by Father Mollinger, of Pittsburgh, were performed on John Brennan, a cripple, and Thomas Frawley, a blind man.

Zanesville, O., is agitated by a war between secret societies and the clergy. The Methodist preachers lately refused to officiate at a funeral where a band of music was employed.

In the pope's reply to Emperor William's New Year message he wishes that monarch success in his struggle with Socialism, "the common enemy of religion and the empire."

Professor Totten, of Yale College, continues to advocate his belief that the millennium may begin at any time now and must arrive soon. He givs elaborate calculations based on scriptural prophecies.

The 1892 session will be the last of the present British Parliament. It will be made important by decisiv action on Home Rule, and perhaps by enactments to purchase land for landless laborers and to abolish hereditary legislators.

A Russian official says: "The present famin is not a bolt from heaven, a single phenomenon that has come suddenly and will as suddenly depart. It is the natural consequence of thirty years' bad management, and will become chronic. If it had not occurred this year it would hav occurred some other year. It is an inevitable result of a series of causes."

Peace has been made between the Catholic church and Indian Commissioner Morgan, who has been opposing Catholicism in Indian schools because "he felt that the influence of the Catholic church upon the Indians, in school work as well as in religious teaching, tended toward its own aggrandizement rather than to the benefit of aborigines, and he objected to the sectarian aspect of the work."

Neal Sims, his two sisters, and two men of his gang, hav been lynched. The girls had angered the lynchers by stoning them. They used to write and set type for the True Way, the paper in which Bob Sims promulgated his new religion. That religion was received with much favor by the moonshiners and outlaws, it consisting of a total repudiation of allegiance to human law and an interpretation of divine law to suit oneself.

Garza, the Mexican outlaw who is trying to overturn the government of President Diaz, and whom United States troops are after in Texas, is backed by the clerical party and is thought to be supported by money from the Catholic church. He says: "There is a system of religious persecution in Mexico that has gained Diaz the hatred of every good churchman and priest." Large numbers of priests hav been arrested for abetting revolutionists.

Father Foley last Sunday denounced the Protestant physicians of the neighborhood from the pulpit of his church in Long Island City, N. Y. He directed his flock to call none but Catholic doctors. He said that he had several times been insulted by Protestant doctors employed by his parishioners. It is known that he was offended recently by being asked to wait a few moments by a physician who with himself had been summoned to a woman with hemorrhage.

Mrs. Mary Macrae Stuart, who has left nearly her whole estate of $5,000,000 to public institutions and churches, has omitted to giv the New York Museum of Art anything, because of its opening Sundays. She always said that it was those who had done nothing for the museums that wanted them open on Sundays. In her bequests she skipped churches and seminaries that teach the newer theology and gave money only to the most conservativ. Dr. Briggs and the Union Theological Seminary get nothing, while Dr. McCosh and family and the Princeton Theological Seminary receive large sums.

Gems of Thought.

Whoever will deign to consult common sense upon religious opinions, and will bestow on this inquiry the attention that is commonly given to any objects we presume interesting, will easily perceive that those opinions hav no foundation; that religion is a mere castle in the air.—D'Holbach.

Artificial religion encourages all cruelties which are exercised in troops—conspiracies, seditions, pillages, ambuscades, surprises of towns, robberies, and murder. Each marches gaily to crime, under the banner of his saint. A certain number of orators are everywhere paid to celebrate these murderous days; some are dressed in a long black close coat, with a short cloak; others hav a shirt above a gown; some wear two variegated stuff streamers over their shirts. All of them speak for a long time, and quote that which was done of old in Palestine, as applicable to a combat in Veteravia.—Voltaire.

Here is what Mr. Talmage preaches, taken from the "Constitution of the Presbyterian church of the United States:" "By the decrees of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated to everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death." That is the doctrin of Mr. Talmage. He worships a God who damns people "for the manifestation of his glory"—a God who made men, knowing that they would be damned—a God who damns babes simply to increase his reputation with the angels. This is the God of Mr. Talmage. Such a God I abhor, despise, and execrate.—Ingersoll.

You will observe, O Lord, that I, the "creature," hav taken considerable pains to enlighten you, the "creator." But pray do not think, O Lord, that, for this, I expect or desire any of your tender mercies, or any distinctiv marks of your divine favor. Pray do not, in consideration of my services, think of elevating me to the position of one of your prophets. Thank you all the same; but I am much better as I am; and, without fee or reward, beyond the personal gratification involved in the consciousness of having enlightened you, I make you heartily welcome to all I hav done for you. To tell you the honest truth, O Lord, I hav a strong aversion to your considering me one of your prophets. I do not forget that Isaiah walked for three years naked for a sign (Isaiah xx, 3). Now, although I am a sort of mongrel Celt, whose Highland ancestors wore little beyond a tartan kilt and a bonnet surmounted by an eagle's feather, I should not like to be doomed to run stark naked like your friend Isaiah. Your friend Jeremiah was, to humor one of your divine whims, commanded to carry his girdle as far as the Euphrates, and there to bury it in the hole of a rock, and after many days to dig it up again (Jer. xiii, 4, 6). Now, I do not wear a girdle, but I wear braces, and I should not like you to play divine pranks upon me by sending me all the way to the Euphrates to bury my braces, and to be sent after many days to dig them up again, after the buckles were rusted and the worsted half rotten. You further commanded Jeremiah to make bands and yokes, and put them about his neck, and send them to several kings (Jer. xxvii, 2, 3). Now, I should like to be excused from doing this sort of thing, as I am not anxious to hav any dealings with kings, neither the king of kings nor any of his punier myrmidons. Perhaps you will remember too, O Lord, that you ordered your friend Ezekiel to draw Jerusalem on a tile and lay siege to it, build a fort against it, and set battering rams against it round about. Moreover, he was commanded by you to take an iron pan and set it for a wall of iron between him and the city, and to lie three hundred and ninety days on one side and forty days on the other. I sincerely hope you will not do me the honor to enroll me among your prophets. Then your prophet Hosea you commanded to take "a wife of whoredoms." Hosea obeyed you and had three children by this wife. You, O Lord, were so pleased with your servant marrying this harlot, Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim, that you yourself gave names to the children she bore to your prophet: the first boy you called Jezreel; then there was a girl, and her you were good enough to call Lo-ruhamah; and the next boy you named Lo-ammi, which was no doubt very good of you (see Hosea i, passim). Still, even at your command, I should rather not marry a lady-of-the-pavement; and I should rather that she did not bear me three children named respectivly Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi. I am not worthy, O Lord, to be so honored by you. Just leave me to marry a simple maid of my own selection and call my children whatever I like, and I am not likely to call any of them Lo-ruhamah. It may be quite true that, in this treatis, I hav obliged you in various ways; but, I repeat, you are heartily welcome to all I may hav done, and I desire no recognition whatever.—Saladin in God and His Book.

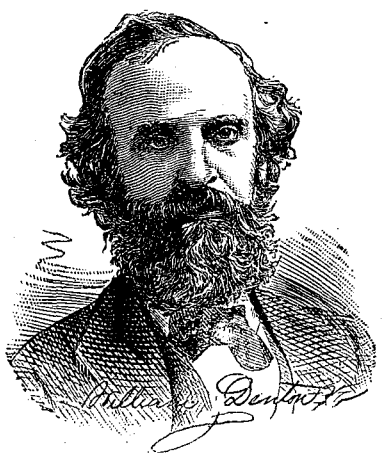
A STRIKE OF

Millionaires Against Miners;

—OR—



THE STORY OF SPRING VALLEY.

By HENRY D. LLOYD.

☞ This book tells how the Spring Valley miners were starved into actual slavery.
It is the story of a monstrous and inhuman crime. It deals not with theories but with facts, figures, and names. It is a powerful and pathetic book.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

A Proposed Constitutional Amendment.

Mr. C. B. Reynolds, as secretary of the Washington State Secular Union, sends here the following:

"The 'National League for the Protection of American Institutions' proposes the following amendment to the federal Constitution:

"'No state shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly, or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.'

"This amendment is in harmony with every principle of right and justice. History of the past testifies that the union of state and church has always resulted in injustice, oppression, and persecution.

"The enactment of this amendment will wrong no one, for it insures full freedom of religious worship. Freedom for all, especial gifts, bounties, and privileges to none.

"The burden of taxation is heavy: appropriation of public money to any religious institution increases the burden, and does great injustice to all other denominations.

"All Liberals are interested to work for the passage of this amendment to the Federal Constitution. While we cannot indorse the platform of the National League, which is simply an association devoted to downing the Catholics and upbuilding Protestantism, we can yet avail ourselvs of the quarrels of the denominations to secure liberty and justice for all."

He accompanies it with the request that Liberals write to their representativs urging the adoption of the proposed amendment.

We must differ from our esteemed contemporary in this, unless the League shall substitute the word "religious" for sectarian. The League, however, will not do this, because it is a Protestant movement designed to put "unsectarian" Protestant Christianity into our government. In the Investigator recently Mr. J. W. Grigsby writes about this same amendment. He says: "This amendment looks to the unwary Secularist like what he wants, and he does not suspect that it is, in fact, a cunningly baited trap, set by his enemies—the National Reformers; but if he will read between the lines he will plainly discern the hook. How any Secularist can be imposed upon by it, emanating from the source it does, I cannot see, but perhaps a few words as to where it originated may not be amiss. Hon. John Jay, ex-minister to Austria, is president of the League, and the Rev. James M. King is secretary. Feb. 15, 1889, Dr. James M. King, then the representativ of the Evangelical Alliance, and now the general secretary of this League, appeared before the United States Senate committee on education and labor and argued in favor of the proposed Blair amendment to the United States Constitution."

That this amendment is not what Mr. Reynolds thinks it is, is evidenced by the fact that the Christian Statesman advocates it, and the Statesman is the Covenanter God-in-the-Constitution organ. Of the amendment it says: "It ought to receive the immediate and serious support of all loyal Americans. Rightly interpreted, it could not be used in any way as a lever to overthrow the Christian elements in our public schools."

The Adventist organizations recognize the Jesuitical character of this League, and hav published their opposition to it. Mr. Grigsby quotes from one of their tracts: "This proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States is to be used only as a means of establishing so-called Protestant Christianity as a national religion. It looks to the same end as the so-called Blair amendment, but it is worse than that, in that whereas the Blair amendment plainly says what it means, this amendment means the same thing, but sets it forth in language that appears to promis precisely the opposit, leaving it to the interpretation of the League to secure by it what the League intends."

The Independent of the 14th instant publishes the views of twenty-six noted men on this proposed amendment. They are all Protestants and all in favor of the amendment. They all oppose appropriation of public funds for sectarian purposes, but none says a word against the nation paying for religious instruction. "Religious freedom" with them means only the right to hav some one religion, and all they ask is that no one sect shall be preferred above another. None of them would oppose the propagation of Christianity by the general government. Indeed, one of the objects of the amendment is to head off the growing power of Catholicism in Indian affairs and substitute therefor Christianity in general.

We trust that no Freethinker will help this League at all. Unsectarian Christianity is as tyrannical as sectarian Christianity. The state should not support either.

The World's Fair.

The bigots are doing their work. January 5th they had introduced in Congress a bill "to prohibit the opening of any exhibition or exposition on Sunday, where appropriations of the United States are expended."

This of course is directed at the World's Fair. Our readers are urged to circulate the letter to Congressmen on this subject to be obtained at this office, and to see that every representativ gets at least a hundred. Then he won't vote for any such bill.

Following the Swine Breeders' Association in requesting the closing of the Fair the Beer Brewers' Association has instructed its agents in Chicago to secure the coöperation of the saloonkeepers of that city and work for the closing of the show on Sundays. "It is calculated that from one hundred thousand to two hundred thousand people will visit the exhibition on Sundays, and that would take away the saloon patronage on that day," is the reason given for the action, and it is an honest business one, for certainly the saloonists care nothing for Sunday, though the majority of them are Roman Catholics. Let it go out to the world that the pigs and the saloonkeepers and the ministers want the Fair closed.

The following letter bears upon this subject:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVS, WASHINGTON,
"Dec. 29, 1891.

"C. A. LINDSAY, ESQ., P. O. Box 586, Butte, Mont.,
Dear Sir: Yours of the 19th instant is received. There are many petitions presented to Congress against having the Columbian Exposition open on Sundays, but I cannot say what the result of them will be.

"So far as I am concerned, I think the Exposition should be open on that day in order to giv people an opportunity to visit it who hav no other time to do so.

"Yours truly, W. W. DIXON,
"M. C. for Montana."

The Weakness of the Clergy.

The illogic and incapacity to reason of the clergy of this neighborhood hav never been more conclusivly shown than in the controversy between them and Colonel Ingersoll printed by the Evening Telegram. We hav reprinted but one side of the dispute because, so far, there has been but one side to it. The fight was started by James Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, who advocated boycotting the Evening Telegram for printing Colonel Ingersoll's little "Christmas Sermon;" but the brave and gallant doctor of a sick divinity has taken no part in the following warfare. The Telegram has sent reporters to various ministers and done all in its power to induce them to defend their faith, but, beyond saying just enough to giv Colonel Ingersoll a text for a further arraignment of Christianity, they hav been discreetly silent, with the exception of the Rev. James M. King and the Rev. B. F. Da Costa. And the former's "arguments" were so completely riddled by Colonel Ingersoll that he withdrew from a contest to which he was so manifestly unequal, and the latter fired his shot from his pulpit to a handful of sympathizing Christians, and the Telegram could therefore present but such portion of his sermon as the reporters could catch. This sermon, however, shows his weakness as a defender of the faith.

He begins by maintaining his adherence to free speech, though he evidently thinks that free speech should stop just short of "traducing ideas and institutions that we deem divine." Such free speech he finds "amusing" and distasteful. After this expression of mild bigotry (which shows that but for the logic of the situation he would advocate legal restraint upon Infidels) he proceeds to "answer" the letter by Colonel Ingersoll reprinted in these columns last week. And this is how he begins:

"Whatever is of God must stand. No revolution in human opinion can impair the existence of that which is divine."

Could any controversialist beg the very question at issue more completely? To make his statement of any value whatever he must first prove his God—which he makes no attempt to do—and he must show what is of God. Then he must tell us what is divine, and why, and how he knows it. But such establishing of a position is apparently the thing farthest from his thought. He just says things, expecting people to accept them without thinking of what he means. Of this character is his statement that "God is love." What does that mean? Is God a lot of love formed into the shape of a man? If not, what did Mr. Da Costa say? What did he mean?

Here is another glittering generality: "Christianity has taught mankind the priceless value and dignity of human nature. It has lifted man up by showing him he is a spark of the infinit." The first of these sentiments is an untruth; the second is a rhetorical rocket. Christianity has abased and degraded human nature, as its history shows. Simon Stylites was a good representativ of the Christians, and as much a spark of the infinit as anyone can be. What is a spark of the infinit, anyway?

The Rev. Mr. Peters, replying to Colonel Ingersoll, is just as unsatisfactory as is Mr. Da Costa. Here is a sample of his "arguments:" "Has not the Bible produced the richest and most varied literature the world has ever seen? Is not the Bible producing books in countless multitudes in every line of thought?" It is sufficient to that to say No, of course; but what shall we say of a man who thinks such an "argument" conclusiv, or even slightly convincing?

One statemant gabbled forth by all these pulpit parrots is that Christianity has given us all our civilization, our enlightenment, our sciences, our industrial arts and appliances and the comforts flowing therefrom. To the instructed, to the true students of history, how monstrous appears this perversion of truth, and how reprehensible its authors. Every science and art has come into being and struggled to its growth against the deadly opposition of the Christian church. Not only of the Christian church but of the Christian religion itself, which in its scriptures givs those false declarations which were used to combat the truths discovered. Geography—Lactantius, St. Augustine, Eusebius, Boniface, Pope Zachary, Tostatus, and countless theologians and hierarchs for centuries stifled the true doctrin of the earth's shape, declaring on the authority of Bible texts that it is a parallelogram, flat, and surrounded by seas. Astronomy—that the earth is stationary and the heavenly bodies move about it, this doctrin taken from scripture was taught by the church till two centuries ago; for asserting the true theory Copernicus and Galileo were persecuted and Bruno burnt; and all this on the warrant of scripture, in which, as Martin Luther cited, we are told that "Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, and not the earth." Geology—this science whose fossils and earth deposits revealed an age of the world a hundred times the six thousand years of Genesis, has grown up only despite endless ecclesiastical persecutions of its devotees. Chemistry and Physics—"Even before these sciences were out of their childhood," says Ex-president White of Cornell University, "the champions of that same old mistaken conception of rigid scriptural interpretation began their war; the catalog of chemists and physicists persecuted or thwarted would fill volumes." Meteorology—those who made their livelihood by petitioning the supernatural for favorable rains or dryness, heat or cold, persecuted to the death the few sage observers who declared the weather to be under natural law; the biblical conception of angels opening and shutting "the windows of heaven" and letting out "the waters that be above the firmament," proved the death of many an utterer of the true theory. Cartography—map-makers whose maps did not place Jerusalem in the center of the world (Ezek. v, 5; xxxviii, 12) were denounced as impious. Anthropogeny—those who hav numbered a score or so of years recollect the clerical vituperation showered on Darwin for discovering the true descent of man. Anatomy—dissection troubled those who looked for resurrection of the body, and it was interdicted as sacrilege. Medicin—countless investigators and physicians hav been persecuted or burnt by the rival dealers in cure by faith, masses, and miracle. Let us turn to the Industrial Arts. Agricultural Progress—we might, says Professor White, go over its battle-fields "and note how, by a most curious perversion of a text of scripture, many of the peasantry of Russia were prevented from raising and eating potatoes, and how in Scotland at the beginning of this century the use of fanning-mills for winnowing grain was denounced as contrary to the text 'the wind bloweth where it listeth,' etc., as leaguing with Satan, who is 'prince of the powers of the air,' and as sufficient cause for excommunication from the Scotch Church." Civil Engineering—here we see how the introduction of railways into France was declared, by an archbishop, to be an evidence of the divine displeasure against country innkeepers who set meat before their guests on fast-days, and now were punished by seeing travelers carried by their doors; and how railroad and telegraph were denounced from noted pulpits as "heralds of Antichrist;" and then we might pass to Protestant England and recall the sermon of the curate of Rotherhite at the breaking in of the Thames tunnel, so destructiv to life and property, declaring that "it was but a just judgment upon the presumptuous aspirations of mortal man." Leaving the Industrial Arts for Social Science—scrupulous pietists in Sweden and the United States opposed censuses because of the texts 2 Sam. xxiv, 1, and 1 Chron. xxi, 1. But volumes would be required to recount the sciences and the sub-sciences, the industrial arts and the fine arts, the inventions and the apparatuses, that hav been antagonized and long repressed by the Christian clergy with their doctrin. A library would be filled by the theological doctrins, the texts and applications of texts, the absurd religious notions, the crazy clerical cavils, the erratic and muddled pious reasonings, which for a dozen centuries barred the path of progress. Another library would barely hold the accounts of the persecutions and tortures, the murders and massacres, with which the church has ever met the seekers of the truth.

In all this controversy Colonel Ingersoll has not met a foeman worthy of him: they are but foils for his play. And the most striking thing about their attacks upon him is their weakness in logic and ignorance of what fairly constitutes arguments.

Colonel Ingersoll and Moncure D. Conway to Speak at the Paine Celebration.

The Paine Celebration in this city will be considerably bigger than usual. The Manhattan Liberal Club proposes to do justice to Thomas Paine and let Americans know to what extent they are indebted to him by hiring Chickering Hall on the evening of January 29th, and letting the people listen to Colonel R. G. Ingersoll and Moncure D. Conway. Paine is one of the world's great men deeply admired by Colonel Ingersoll, and Mr. Conway has written the best Life of him extant. They will undoubtedly do the Author-Hero ample justice. Tickets, 50 cents; addresses at 8 o'clock.

We regret to state that, if we may believe the daily papers, our good Presbyterian president worked—really worked!—last Sunday by attending a cabinet meeting of his own calling. But he is in favor of shutting up the World's Fair on Sundays and of a Sunday law for Washington which shall prevent any citizen of that city following his last Sunday's illustrious example.

Colonel Ingersoll's speech at the Unitarian dinner at Sherry's was a characteristic one, and we hav left all the disfiguring laughters and applauses in to show how the Unitarians took it. But because the colonel consented to instruct the Unitarians it is no sign he will join their church. On the contrary it is an indication that the Unitarians are becoming broader—approaching closer to Rationalism. The committee who waited upon Colonel Ingersoll, it is said, assured him that they wanted him to say anything he felt called upon to say and that the association individually and collectivly could stand it. Colonel Ingersoll's congratulations to the members, therefore, upon their acquirement of the virtue of "intellectual hospitality" were not an empty compliment.

Several English medical journals hav recently called attention to a fact, sustained by common observation, that the young women of the present day are better developed physically, taller, plumper, stronger, and healthier than the young women of fifty, one hundred, one hundred and fifty, or two hundred years ago, and that in this continuous and perceptible improvement of condition and aspect there are no steps backward. This, the journals say, is the result of improved health, the result of a more scientific mode of life, better hygienic conditions, larger latitude in outdoor exercise, better nutrition, better physical culture, and softening and equalizing of the climate. And we ourselvs will comment that the means by which we hav obtained this "more scientific mode of life, better hygienic conditions," more "exercise," and better "nutrition and physical culture" has been the dethronement of Christianity by science. It has been the displacement of the priest by the investigator and the teacher. It has been the diversion of attention from the supernatural to the natural. It has been the neglect of another world and attention to this.

A Catholic paper laments this sad situation: "There is every reason to believe that if the pope should appear in the streets of Rome like any other citizen it would giv occasion to insult and riot, and unless the authorities should be more prompt in interfering than they usually are, the pope would be in danger of his life from the Piedmontese rabble that has infested the city since the revolution." On this we will make these remarks: The citizens of Rome and Italy are those who hav been the most familiar with the popes. They hav known them longer and more closely than any other people. They hav been ruled by them more thoroughly and pervasivly than any others. Their condition thirty years ago, before the papal downfall and the rise of the Italian kingdom, was the result of unmixed papal rule, and they here had an unusually decisiv test of the value of that domination. If they are so ill pleased with those popes, and with that rule, that they would mob a pope on opportunity, it reflects very badly upon those ecclesiarchs and their methods.

In these days while Catholics are so importunately demanding control of our schools, an occasional glance should be thrown upon the educational condition in which Catholicism left the countries that she once ruled. The state in which she left Italy at the overthrow of her power in the years about 1860 and 1870, is thus recited by the historian Mackenzie: "Priestly influences had been studiously hostil to education, and the expelled despots bequeathed to free Italy the care of a fearfully ignorant population. In 1864 eighty Italians in every hundred were unable to read or write, and in 1870 sixty-four in every hundred of the young men who came up for military service were similarly uninstructed. The Italian government applied with becoming energy a remedy to evils which were justly deemed incompatible with the stability of free institutions. A parliamentary grant, which has now swelled to nearly one million sterling, was voted for public instruction. No time was lost in adding to this grant the greater portion of the revenues enjoyed by the monastic establishments. Of these there were two thousand four hundred, inhabited by nearly thirty thousand idle and unprofitable men and women. The act of 1866 dissolved all these institutions; and after providing for life-interests on a scale which could not be considered inappropriate to persons who had undertaken vows of poverty and self-denial, the property was devoted to the education of the people."

OF THE

California State Liberal Union,

AT UNION SQUARE HALL,

421 POST STREET, - - SAN FRANCISCO,

January 30 and 31, 1892,

TO OPEN AT 10 O'CLOCK SATURDAY MORNING WITH BUSINESS SESSION.

To the Members and Friends of the Union, Citizens of California: The convention to be held this year is one of great importance. Standing as we do on the platform of civil and religious liberty, grave dangers confront us. Both in California and throughout the nation there is call to immediate action.

Determined efforts are being made for the enactment of a Sabbath law in California. Defeated at the last session of the legislature, the enemies of a liberal and rational observance of the Sunday are conspiring for a more strenuous effort in favor of ecclesiastical legislation, and with money and organizations, supported by the churches, are now carrying forward their campaign. Unless we are wide-awake and watchful a Sabbath law will be enforced in California, as it is now already enforced in a large number of its municipalities by local ordinances. We must understand the situation, arouse our forces and prepare for action. The issue is forced upon us, and we cannot avoid it.

In regard to the World's Fair, there is need of vigorous work. Never has the church made a more desperate endeavor to place its heel upon American institutions. It wants to run the World's Fair for the benefit of its religions and priests—to make it a church fair, instead of a World's Fair. Councils and conventions held in the interest of the churches hav declared for the closing of the gates on Sunday of this magnificent exhibition of art and industry. California should speak with no uncertain voice in a question of such infinit importance. To close the World's Fair on Sunday would be a union of church and state in this republic, fatal to human progress.

The Bible in schools question also demands our earnest attention. Great progress has been made in this matter. In Wisconsin, Oregon, and Washington legal decisions hav declared that the Bible is a sectarian book, and must be excluded from the public schools. We need the same decisions in California. The Bible is forced upon our schools. In Sacramento, the capital of the state, the Bible is read in the schools by order of the board of education. This is an outrage. An effort will be made to bring this matter before the courts of the state. Undoubtedly Bible-reading in the public schools is contrary to the constitution of California.

Another matter of great importance is appropriations out of the state treasury for the support of sectarian institutions. This is done in California. The Liberal tax-payer is compelled in this way to support the church, which, as Jefferson says, is "wicked and tyrannical." The following instance will illustrate the injustice of these appropriations. There is an institution in San Francisco called "The Ladies' Relief Protectiv Society." According to its constitution it is an unsectarian association, and as such secures aid from the state treasury for the support of orphans, to the extent of thousands of dollars a year. Within the last year an eminent Spiritual lecturer, Mrs. Watson, desired to adopt a little child, six years of age. She offered to this child, this "waif of humanity," a beautiful home, an opportunity for education and the care and protection of a mother. This society refused to giv Mrs. Watson the privilege of adopting this child, on the ground that she would not promis to send it regularly to an established Christian Protestant church and Sunday-school. Here was a religious test applied in the administration of a state institution. Here was a cruel act, worthy of the Dark Ages. Nothing could be said against the character of Mrs. Watson; she is known and respected throughout the state. She is a Spiritualist and a Liberal, and therefore she is denied the possession of this little child. The iron hand of ecclesiastical barbarism is put upon this orphan, and to-day it is compelled to remain in the asylum and not permitted to accept the generosity of the noble woman. And this is in the state of California, in an institution supported by all the taxpayers of California. It is an insult to the Spiritualists and Liberals of this state. All are compelled to support this institution, which for bigotry and superstition stands side by side with the Spanish Inquisition. Are the Liberals of the state so indifferent to humanity, to justice, that they will allow this act to transpire without protest?

The convention will take this matter into consideration and see if the state institutions of California are to be administered in this sectarian fashion.

Our platform has no creed—it is simply human rights. It is the immortal words of General Grant, "Keep the church and state forever separate." All Liberals of every belief—Spiritualists, Theosophists, Freethinkers, the liberal-minded Jew, the Christian who is willing to giv to others the same rights that he claims for himself—all are cordially invited to meet in this convention and aid in the triumph of justice, freedom, and equality.

Able speakers are expected to be present from all parts of the Coast. Music will be furnished by friends, and a splendid, sociable time is expected, together with work and inspiring addresses. There will be a grand Paine celebration on Friday evening, January 29th. A magnificent program will be presented in honor of one of the greatest of American citizens, who gave his life to the defense of truth and the rights of man.

The expenses of this convention and celebration will be about two hundred dollars. Will every friend who receives this circular contribute what he can, immediately? Aid this work. Every little helps. Giv something, each one. In spite of many discouragements, let us press on to glorious victory. Let us hav the grandest gathering of Liberals ever held in the state.

Answer this at the earliest possible moment. Direct all letters to my address: 101 Fifth street, San Francisco.

I hope for a generous response. If you can't come to the convention, at least help to make it a splendid success. Lend a hand.

Yours truly, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
President of the California State Liberal Union.
San Francisco, Jan. 1, 1892.

News and Notes.

The lecture at San Jose Sunday afternoon, January 3d, was not very well attended; but if the fair weather continues, and the balmy breath of spring still blows, perhaps there will be a better showing as time rolls on. Fortunately the cyclone and the blizzard do not visit here and there is some chance to fight orthodoxy with a fair field.

The audience was "fit, though few." Miss Anna Vastrousky inspired us with excellent music. Our good bishop was there; Mr. and Mrs. Magerheimer, whose hospitable roof givs welcome; Mr. and Mrs. Fisher; Mr. Dibble, of Santa, and Mr. and Mrs. Woodhams. They are talking of having one or two lectures at Santa Clara in connection with the campaign here. I was pleased to meet with Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Schwartz. The roses bloom again along time's march. I was delightfully surprised with the meeting at San Francisco, and so were all the "old guard." We did not expect half as many. The hall was full and every seat was occupied; in fact, there were not enough seats. Evidently we can put this series of lectures on the prosperous list. "The Evolutions of a Century" make an attractiv theme.

Old friends came crowding around. Dr. and Mrs. Whitford were present from Butte City; Kiershi, of El Paso; Burgess, of Livermore. It was quite a reunion of old comrades. Many new faces were seen also.

At the close of the lecture Mr. Thomas Curtis made an eloquent memorial address in honor of William Paden, who, both in England and America, away back from the Chartist movement, has been a noble supporter of Freethought. We were indebted to Mrs. A. Schou, of Oakland, for a beautiful piano solo at the opening of the meeting. Mr. Schou acted as chairman in the absence of our president, Mr. C. F. Burgman.

The San Francisco Call givs quite an extended notice of our genial Liberal comrade, Dr. W. Botsford, at whose home I find the generous fellowship that mingles pleasure with toil. Dr. Botsford occupies a high position in his profession, and is not afraid to openly acknowledge his Freethought principles. He is of old Connecticut stock, was born, however, in New Brunswick, but is a true American under our flag.

I hav received a letter from C. Beal, who is pushing his Liberal enterprise on the Columbia river with his usual energy. He is about to build a Freethought university and opera house at his new home. I would advise all Liberals who hav an eye to the coast, and want to find a place where there is intellectual companionship, to correspond with C. Beal, Cathlamet, Wash. I like the country about Columbia river. I believe it has a great future.

An instance has been brought to my notice of the value of "Christian charity." The church boasts of its charities, and the idea is abroad that these charities are of some service. Yet after all they are humbugs. The only true charity is secular charity, conducted on business principles, where help is given in a common-sense way without any religious fervor attached.

A gentleman of my acquaintance, of Catholic family, had a little sister sick with the diphtheria. He was able to pay for medical attendance but desired to place her in a hospital. He took her to a Catholic hospital, and, to his surprise, admittance was refused on the ground that the disease was contagious and could not be guarded against. My friend, uncertain what to do, applied to the French hospital, which is not under any religious auspices whatsoever. It is simply a scientific medical institution. The little girl was admitted at once. "But the disease is contagious," said my friend; "my sister has just been refused admission to the Catholic hospital." "Oh, we will take care of that," said the doctor in attendance.

Think of it, the Catholic hospital had God on its side, and the Holy Ghost, and all the angels, and the multitude of saints, and prayers innumerable, and yet it didn't dare to take charge of a little sick girl. What an infernal lie that religious hospital is—a miserable, cowardly institution. A secular hospital with only human skill and care to depend upon is not afraid to take charge of any sick person, as it is in duty bound to do. That's the difference between religious humbug and scientific humanity. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lectures and Meetings.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S present lecture appointments are as follows: January 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE Milwaukee Liberal Club's officers for the coming year are A. B. Severance, president; Eugene Low, vice-president; Miss Velma McManus, secretary; W. O. Greene, treasurer.

AT 104 East Sixty-sixth street, in the Educational Gymnasium, at 3:30 P.M., Sunday, January 24th, Dr. Ward will lecture on "The Church a Necessity as a Sociological Factor." A new type of "sermons" from the standpoint and on the authority of natural science.

THE Pittsburgh Secular Society will celebrate the one hundred and fifty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, at the Curry University, Friday evening, Jan. 29, 1892, at 8 P.M. Oration by John R. Charlesworth, of New York. To conclude with social. Admission: Gentlemen fifty cents, ladies twenty-five cents.

THE Ohio Liberal Society, of Cincinnati, has leased Douglass Hall, N.W. Cor. Sixth and Walnut, and will occupy it for regular Sunday evening meetings. January 24th—George Collins, "Buddha and Christ," with readings from Buddhist scriptures; January 31st—Prof. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas City, Mo., "The Sunday Question."

THE American Secular Union will hold a mass meeting on February 27th at Central Music Hall, Chicago, to protest against closing the World's Fair on Sundays. There will be several speakers, occupying ten or fifteen minutes each, preceded from 7:30 to 8 o'clock by a musical program. Societies willing to coöperate are requested to appoint a committee or representativ to confer with the secretary of the Union, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, 402 West Madison street.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

Victor E. Lennstrand is shaking up the clergy in southern Sweden, and has during the past month organized several local societies.

A fox recently made his appearance in the Church of the Holy Heart at Montmartre, Paris. The Swedish paper, Social Democraten, thinks the only strange thing about the occurrence is that the fox had four legs.

Protestant sectarian papers in Germany are shaking the "bloody shirt." The Holy Coat in Trier, and the resolutions of the Catholic congress held in Danzig, make them fear that Catholicism will be the upper dog for a time to come.

The pope has through an apostolic letter declared Virgin Mary to be the patron and protectiv saint of the Congo States. Still both the Belgian and German governments continue to send gunpowder and cartridges there, evidently as assistant protectiv saints.

We are sorry to state that our German contemporary, Neues Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, has ceased to exist. It was always a welcome guest. We hav now to depend on Das Menschenthum for news from Germany, and hope our friend, Dr. Specht, will see that it arrives regularly.

During the month of October last there was registered in Godall, province of Saragossa, Spain, two births and one death, and in neither case was the service of the church demanded. This is the best way to make the clerical beasts howl, remarks Las Dominicales. We think the same, and hope a continued howl will soon arise in the United States.

The wave of clericalism which not long ago struck Meaux, in department Seine-et-Marne, France, has already lost its force. LeBriard announces that citizen Victor Modeste, ex-mayor of Meaux, and author of important works on social science, gained a splendid victory over his clerical opponents at the late municipal election. Mr. Modeste is a hard-shell Freethinker, hence his election is a victory for Freethought.

The cost of legal proceedings necessary to the banishment of Henry V. Berghell, the Finnish-Swedish Freethinker, amounts to $60. This, however, is the smallest item. The disgrace Sweden has inflicted upon herself by heretic persecution cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. According to the latest news Mr. Berghell has left Kristiania, Norway, on his way to the United States. If this proves to be true, Mr. Berghell will please send his address to the writer of this news and direct same in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Civil marriages belong to the order of the day in France. At the marriage of Mr. Griffet, secretary to the Freethought society of Nevers, to Miss Berthe Thallé, which was held in the state-room of the city hall, over three hundred persons were present. Speeches were delivered and an excellent band furnished the music, among other tunes La Marseillaise, when the ceremony was over. Our French friends hav evidently discovered the superiority of a sensible discourse to the twaddle of a priest and of the secular tunes to hymns.

Freethought will soon be agitated in Norway. A year ago Missionary A. E. Jenson left Kristiania with a recommendation in his inside pocket. It was given by one of the foremost clergymen in Kristiania, and stated that Mr. Jenson was very pious, a great evangelist and Infidel-smasher, and advised all clergymen to procure his assistance. Since he left Kristiania Mr. Jenson has visited Germany and Denmark, and at a visit to the Stockholm Freethinkers he found he had lost his Christianity. He has now returned to Norway and will there work for Freethought.

From a copy of the Estates of France, published in 1699, we gain the following information: France at that time contained 4,000 parishes, 18 archbishops, 112 bishoprics, 900 abbeys, and 12,400 priories. The clergy which used to manipulate and govern these amounted to 40,000 curates, 30,000 vicars, 16,000 canoneos, 13,000 singers, 6,000 choir assistants, 15,000 Capelanes, 20,000 Benedicts, 10,000 Carmelites, 40,000 clerical tenants, 20,000 Capuchins, 12,000 mendicants, 15,000 hermits, and 80,000 novices; besides these a secular clergy numbering 193,500. The cost of maintaining this enormous establishment was 300,000,000 fr. a year. And yet people wonder that the Encyclopedists appeared, and that they were followed by the glorious French Revolution.

In the year 1890 there was contributed by Protestants to foreign missions $13,500,000, distributed as follows:

		Cents.
France	per unit of population	2-29
Germany	" " " "	15-58
Holland	" " " "	15-58
Norway and Sweden	" " " "	47-145
Denmark	" " " "	56-125
United States and Canada	" " " "	257-290
Great Britain	" " " "	2 7-36

Which is about one and one-fourth cents per Protestant inhabitant of those countries, estimating, as we do, from Christian statistics, their number at one hundred and thirty millions.

As our readers are aware, our brethren in Belgium hav a Freethinkers' orphan asylum. To get this institution on a sound financial basis, the various societies giv celebrations, suppers, picnic parties, lectures, etc., besides contributing individually and directly. It occurs to us that the various Secular Unions in this country may do the same. We hav no orphan asylum, it is true, but we can work for the Secularization of the various states by sending out lecturers, giving steady employment to those who are in the field, contributing to the "literature fund" started by THE TRUTH SEEKER, and at each meeting recommending our Liberal papers and having THE TRUTH SEEKER for sale.

The Freethought societies from the eastern portion of France held a separate congress in June last, the proceedings of which appear in the October number of Bulletin Mensuel. Twenty-two societies sent delegates, and a local organization of Freethought in east France was brought about. Mr. Danaud, delegate from Mâcon, was elected president. The following demands were unanimously requested: 1. Cessation of an embassy to the papal court. 2. Compulsory military service for all (clergy included). 3. Prohibition of the wearing of religious garments outside of ceremonial worship. 4. Enforcement of law of Aug. 18, 1792, by which all religious orders were suppressed and their property sold as belonging to the French nation. 5. Return of the priest under the communal jurisdiction, all the consequences of this step to be strictly enforced, and continual work of Freethinkers until this has been realized. To bring this reform about there were proposed: a, Organization throughout France of a movement having a petition to this end as sole object; b, Demand of the representativs of the people, both before and after election, that they push the matter; c, Organized propaganda, through speeches, fly-leaves, congresses, to be held in even the smallest villages. 6. To forward to Parliament a petition demanding the immediate prohibition of all religious orders, and the confiscation of their property for the benefit of the state.

A Voice from the West Indies.

One of the most important cases in the annals of crime in Trinidad has just been decided. It created very considerable stir since the preliminary inquiry, but what makes it more so are the circumstances under which the crime was supposed to hav been committed.

A colored man was recently charged with the murder of another colored man. The case went through the several preliminary trials and also before the supreme court, with three judges and jury, and was decided by an acquittal. It was based on purely circumstantial evidence of a very strong character.

But what makes this case an interesting one to me is that the supposed murderer is an "obeah man," or a diviner or soothsayer. This obeah man was employed by a young man possessing some means to go about the pasture adjoining his house and discover whether there was a hidden treasure.

Digging had been going on for some weeks and the murdered man, who was considered to be well off, was supposed to hav a share in the digging. His body was found under a Cois canon tree, which is connected with the obeah practices.

The view I take of this case is that the murderer, having the aid of the murdered, who accompanied him to the spot, there offered him as a sacrifice to the obeah deities. It is generally supposed by the inhabitants of these islands that the devil is always to be seen, and can be invoked, under the Cois canon tree, as also another very large tree—the Fromage or silk cotton tree. Old Nick can there be seen at the ungodly hour of midnight, when all are at rest.

The finding of the treasure necessitated a sacrifice, and Old Nick being one of the deities, this unfortunately poor man was accordingly given away to him, so that he could divulge the hiding-place of the treasure.

Another notorious circumstance connected with obeahism is the mingling of its practices with Roman Catholicism, for the very day in which the murderer was found not guilty, he immediately repaired to a Roman Catholic church and there offered his thanks to Beelzebub's antagonist—God. Sometimes some poor old negro who merits more pity, compassion, and charity than derision is pointed out to me as an obeah man. The church is their seeking-place. One has the power of divesting himself of his skin, and is called a soucouyan. All of them are devout church-members.

Another most curious fact is that when one is in another West India island he is told if he wants strong obeah to go to another island, where the nativs are better versed in its practices.

The inhabitants around here—the ignorant ones—believe that when a candle is lighted by them and placed on the altar of any church, and a prayer is recited, that prayer, coupled with the candle burning, has the power of doing whatever mischief the one who prays asks for. It is rather curious, but not more curious than a tale which was told me from the island of Madeira on the coast of Africa. There is a church there, and whenever a drop of wax falls clear of the taper on the altar, it is a sure sign that some one has fallen over a precipice. These tales all require a little more salt.

Through some irregularity at the post-office here I hav not been able to read your issue of November 7th, containing the report of the Congress of the American Secular Union, before now, which I characterize as the most flimsy and poor congress that I hav ever read of.

Coming events cast their shadows before, and as such the American Secular Union cast its shadow of failure when Westbrook, D.D., and Miss Craddock were elected to the offices of president and secretary respectivly.

I thoroughly agree and indorse Mr. Wakeman's and Dr. Foote's attitude at the congress, as also the remarks which fell from them. If the American Secular Union wishes to be a success it must strike out boldly for Secularism as a system of philosophy and not hide under the Unitarian mask as it has done during the past administration. It must adopt the proposed amendment to the constitution made by Mr. Wakeman and work as the English, Canadian, and Australian Secular Unions. Then and not till then will it be a success.

Unitarians and Liberal Christians cannot be conscientious Secularists, and if they wish a political institution for the separation of church and state they are at liberty to do so. But for the present the American Secular Union must be rescued by the American Secularists from the Slough of Despond in which it has been unfortunately cast.

I am not against political action being made a side issue of the Union. On the contrary, it should work side by side with the philosophy of Secularism as taught by that great Secularist, Colonel Ingersoll: "The time to be happy is now, the place to be happy is here, and the way to be happy is to make others so."

English Notes.

This evening I was scanning a religious newspaper. What a world of lessons one can find in the advertisement columns! Look at the titles of the books published and you can almost feel the pulse of the theological patient. You do not need to read the books. Every title-page indicates the uncertain state of modern theology and the disruption which Freethinking cannot help but bring about. Here, for instance, is the British Weekly, an undenominational print from Paternoster Row. First comes a book to whitewash those miserable tyrants, the Pilgrim fathers.

The book is entitled "The Pilgrim Fathers, Neither Puritans nor Persecutors." Well, I wonder what else they were. Perhaps they were Roman Catholics or Atheists. Anyhow the lesson is the same. It is quite permissible to the Christian conscience to twist history, theology, or common sense to mean just exactly that which answers the priestly purpose for the time being. Another seems to indicate that two thousand years of Christianity hav not fully demonstrated the use of churches: "The Mission of Christianity, or What are Churches For?" And yet when we try to explain it to the public we are pelted for our pains! What inconsistency! This work comprises "The Home, What Does Salvation Mean? The Nursery—Growth or Sacerdotal Magic? The Recreation Ground, The Church's Mission of Amusement, The Training School, Supernatural Christianity, and The Army—Christ's Utopia." Well, the price of this precious composition is close on a dollar, and it is highly recommended by the Methodist Times, lying Hugh Price Hughes's paper. It just shows you what sort of stuff the Christians can and do read; and then they drop down on their knees and thank the dear Lord they were not born heathens. No wonder the poor heathens look down upon them with pity in their eyes.

The Church Times, which is the greatest champion of ritualism here, affords amusement to the lover of books. Any number of sermons, sermonets, and sermon notes are advertised in its columns, so that the most incompetent parson can make some sort of a show in his pulpit without much trouble. "Comfort of God" is especially designed for mourners, though what it will do for them is not quite apparent. One famous writer about the lives of saints, the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, publishes eight sermons on "The Birth of Jesus," without attempting to show how it came about. "Love Beyond the Grave" seems a little too previous, does it not? There is plenty of room amongst Christians for a little more love on this side of the grave, without their getting very excited about the other. But then the Rev. Arthur Brinckman wants to "comfort mourners" again. I do not know, of course, but it does seem that a religion which requires fasting, praying, watching, contrite hearting, and all that sort of thing to squeeze one's soul into heaven, and then leaves one's relations after death in such a state of anxiety as to what had become of one, is just about ten thousand years behind the peace and joy which comes from living without any God at all. I do know this, that for all the joy these parsons can deal out at a quarter of a dollar a time I would not leave my Secularism to fall back upon their Christianity. Would any of you?

Our Freethought world is quiet this week after the school board election. A serene calm has taken the place of feverish excitement; and so we shall hav time to look around us some and see how the Christians are enjoying themselvs. First of all then for your compatriots, Moody and Sankey. The Kentucky Evangelist, G. O. Barnes, who used to labor with his more famous craftsman, Mr. Moody, was telling me a few nights ago that he had been to hear them since their arrival in London, and that they had got off the old lines altogether and were preaching a quite (to him) unpalatable doctrin. It seems also that the Rev. Robert Thomson, parish minister of Penicuik, in Scotland, has raised his voice against the Americans. Rather than hav them in his church, as many of the parishioners wished, he would say good-bye to Penicuik and his profession; and before he would allow them to sing and preach there he would hav to be laid in the churchyard. I am so glad that Christianity is a religion of love. In these hard days it is quite refreshing to see how these Christians do love one another. Some excitement is still felt over the revision of the Confession of Faith. The London presbytery has modified it almost to annihilation and they are getting along very well without it. Save for all these changes and excitements the church would fare very badly. Not long since Dr. Parker started one-minute sermons. Another parson followed suit with five-minute sermons; and now a Chelmsford minister has started ten-minute discourses on various subjects. Evidently theology is as nasty as pills to church-going people.

A Scotch Baptist preacher has decided to relieve his congregation from the task of raising his salary and is innocently going to trust to two collecting boxes placed at the church doors. Quite a big minister tried the voluntary system in London and could not get bread and cheese out of it. Then the congregation pulled down the chapel, and it is down yet. What they want now is money to put it up again; but the public keeps winking the other eye without replenishing the exchequer. Now they want a parson as well.

The Methodists are all sixes and sevens. Somebody wrote that Methodism was only a bubble on the retreating wave of Protestantism. That upset the Rev. Charles Garrett so much that he felt bound to reply. For the last year, he tells us, the Wesleyan body has made 1,000 new members per week. Exactly, replies the critic, and if you work that out, the net gain is not a dozen a week. Suppose the annual increase of new members to be 52,000; deduct 6,000 for deaths, and we shall find no less a number than 46,000 withdrawals. Of course I do not vouch for the correctness of the statements, but the practical decline of Wesleyanism in Britain seems to bear the antagonist out. He also says that whereas there are over 30,000,000 Methodists in the world less than 1,000,000 are under John Wesley's conference. The growth of modern Christianity is all of a piece—what we call in England an Irish advance; whilst Secularism is increasing on all sides.

Just now the walls are thickly placarded with posters about a big meeting to be held at Exeter Hall, the home of Christian gatherings. It is to be a great demonstration against the opium trade. Among the speakers will be two of special interest, Mr. Cheok Hong Cheong, superintendent of church missions to the Chinese at Melbourne, Australia; and Miss Soonderbai Powar, an Indian Christian gentlewoman from Bombay. So saith the poster. It is a good thing for this question to be raised, whatever one's particular views about it may be. England is a Christian nation and therefore not to be overtrusted in international morality. You can judge that by a clause taken from one of the government licenses in Bombay. The little district of Broach contains a population of 326,930 men, women, and children. Clause I runs: "That he will sell at retail at the shops aforesaid not less than 12,492 pounds of duty-paid opium in the aggregate during the aforesaid period. If he sells less than that quantity, he will pay to the government in the manner and on the dates hereinafter specified penalty at the rates of rs. 5 per lb. on the quantity of opium required to make up the said minimum." Well, 12,492 pounds of opium make 5½ tons, to be consumed by 327,000 persons! And yet the government are eternally saying to the frenzied appeals of the wives and children of the opium-eaters that they are doing all they possibly can to restrain its use. For a good open-mouthed lie commend me to a Christian government. Atheists may be dreadfully immoral, but they are not in the hunt with their Christian competitors.

Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

My Lecture Trip.

Previous to my departure from Centralia I had the great pleasure of meeting with many Freethinkers who, though not knowing me personally, still know me by reputation through the columns of our Liberal papers. One of these, Mr. J. S. Shaw, of Chicago, very generously gave me $5 as a contribution to aid me in my work, for which I must ask permission to take these means of publicly thanking him. The Daily Sentinel, the local paper of this town, published again a report of my second lecture, and although he had earnestly invited the local preachers to come out and defend their creeds, they failed to put in an appearance, but saw fit to call upon a local physician who had attended my lectures, to know what I had said. The result of this was a letter from some "very good Christian" in the issue of December 30th, which a friend had forwarded to me. The letter ran as follows:

THE LIBERAL LECTURER.

EDITOR SENTINEL: In your paper of yesterday is nearly a column of the teachings of the "Liberal lecturer" of Sunday eve, closing with the hope that some preacher may be selected to argue with him. I write to express my hope of the very reverse. When a boy, roaming the woods with my little dog Sancho, I found him engaged in a fierce debate with an unknown animal. Of course I took the dog's part, and with one blow stopped the fight, but had to run from the aroma which filled the air. From that day to this I hav always given a skunk of every kind the largest room to pass on the other side.

There can be no equality in a debate between a man of truth, honor, and decency and a "Liberal" who is regardless of either and delights in distilling the filthiness of his imagination into the ears of the young and thoughtless. The licentiousness and bloodshed of the French Revolution were the direct result of "unchaining the tiger" by just such teachings. So with the ignorance, depravity, vice, and crime of the slums of Chicago and New York and all large cities. "To the pure all things are pure, but to the defiled and unbelieving there is nothing pure, but even their mind and conscience are defiled." No, let all Christian people go on with the work of "feeding the hungry and clothing the naked and lifting up the fallen and blessing humanity in every way," and leave those who "delight in lies" to wallow in the mire of their own unclean imaginations until the end, when the sentence of the judge, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still," shall seal them over to their own beloved lust forever.

SENEX.

Is not this a truly Christian letter, written in a truly Christian spirit? "Senex" should be the last to speak of the sentence of the judge upon the filthy, when we consider the exquisit sweetness of his language; but, being requested to make some answer thereto, I hav penned the following reply:

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 5, 1892.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CENTRALIA DAILY SENTINEL, Dear Sir: In your issue of December 30th last, which has been forwarded to me, I notice a strangely characteristic "Christian" letter, written no doubt by a strangely characteristic "Christian" gentleman, one who is evidently ashamed of the production of his own thoughts, seeing that he dare not attach his name thereto; posing as a champion of Christ, and yet hiding his identity under the nom de plume of "Senex." What moral courage, what heroic grandeur, he displays! What a self-sacrificing spirit it requires to-day to defend the religion of Jesus when he dares not to come out in the open light of day, prefering to cower under the walls of the churches, instead of venturing forth into the bracing morning air, where there is the fresh stir of healthful life!

Hide thy diminished head, thou thing of darkness, hide; and like the rest of thy class, keep forever in the shadowy darkness of thine own obscurity.

Happily, the age of intolerance is past; education is rapidly dispelling the clouds of orthodoxy; men are learning, though many of them in secresy and stealth, to break their mental fetters; and soon our progeny will be able to gaze back with astonishment at this hideous nightmare, which has appalled and oppressed so many of their ancestors.

It would perhaps hav been better for mankind had "Senex" kept to killing skunks, or has he at last found one that he has not the courage to face, but like a cowardly assassin, prepares to stab him in the back, and like a timid and braggart gladiator, enters the mental arena when the enemy has gone?

Truly, the professed followers of Christ, ever consistent with their own intolerant spirit, are ever ready to condemn those who cannot appreciate the cruel dogmas of their horrible creed. That which they cannot overcome by the force of argument or the love of truth, they must needs abuse. Slander has ever been an effectiv weapon in their hands, but this only shows how low a man may descend in the moral and intellectual atmosphere and yet remain a champion of the Bible. His reference to the French Revolution either shows the grossest ignorance upon the subject, or else a willful perversion of the true facts of history. The Atheistic party in the French Revolution were the Gironde, many of whom perished in their attempts to arrest bloodshed, while Robespierre, the Christian, continued the bloodshed until it drowned him. Paine, the Infidel, imperiled his own life for daring to stand up in the general assembly and vote against bloodshed. Danton, one of the chief figures in that fight for freedom, was an Atheist, and he lost his head under the horrible knife of the guillotin, trying to save the name of his country from shame. It is true the "tiger" was unchained, but verily, it was the Jesuitical tiger. But now I rejoice to say that with one fell swoop France freed herself from monarchy and priestcraft for ever.

Yes, "keep on feeding the hungry and clothing the naked and blessing humanity." Feed them and bless them as ye hav fed and blessed Ireland. Feed them and bless them as ye hav fed and blessed Italy, Spain, Mexico, Abyssinia, Africa, and others too numerous to mention, and ye will hav accomplished your deadly mission. "Think not I am come to send peace on earth," said Jesus Christ; "I am not come to send peace, but a sword." And wherever the Christian religion has gone it has carried out that text to the very letter. Rivers of human blood hav flowed in the holy wars; human lives were lost in numbers impossible to reckon; thousands hav perished upon the stake, the rack, and the gibbet, thus ever increasing the sum total of misery lying at the foot of the blood-red cross of Christ. Wherever it has gone, it has broken human hearts, and left its track in human blood.

"He that is filthy, let him be filthy still," is indeed a true exposition of the Christian creed. But we say, There shall be no more "filthy." Our work is to remove the uncleanness of society; to regenerate man both socially and morally; to fit him for a higher, a nobler, and a better moral plane.

Christianity has only to deal with men when they are dead. But we hav to do with the real and living man, telling him not to wait until he is dead for that which, living, he might enjoy. Howl on, ye demons of superstition; the wounded animal always whines. Howl on, ye votaries of faith; but your yells and curses are vain; abuse and slander can never hurt the truth; if hurled against it like the thunderbolts of orthodoxy, it glances harmlessly by; 'tis only in the breast of error and falsehood that it will rankle like a poisoned arrow.

To-day your curses are vain. Science has set the ball of education rolling. The chariot-wheels of progress are revolving with startling rapidity, and vain shall be the howls, yells, and curses of priestly superstition to stay them in their onward course.

Respectfully yours, JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Taking leave of the friends in Centralia, I started again for Waterloo, Ind., to giv two more lectures; there had been a little miscalculation on my part with respect to the route, there being two Waterloos in the state. Hence a hurried correspondence took place between us, but I finally reached there in time. My arrival at the depot brought gladness to the heart of Jacob Saltsman, he having arranged for my lectures and having begun to doubt if I should reach them on time. We passed each other at the depot; never having met before, we did not know each other. I made a few inquiries for his house, and started off to find him, while he, expecting to find me a man well advanced in years, had gone running off after an old man with a gray beard. I was soon pointed out to him, however, so matters were made straight.

I gave two lectures here; one each on the 30th and 31st of December. My first lecture succeeded in completely filling the Opera House; there were not seats sufficient for all, so many had to stand up, but on the second night the house was packed almost to suffocation. A local sky-pilot took down a few notes of my first lecture, but he did not venture out again on the second night. As usual, he had nothing to say while I was there, but I hav been advised later that he eternally roasted the Freethinkers of Waterloo when safely ensconced in the coward's castle and when no one could hav an opportunity to reply. While here I was the guest of Jacob Saltsman and wife, who did their utmost to add to my comfort. Waterloo has a population of about eighteen hundred, and judging from my audiences, and from the way in which my lectures were received, I should say that it has an enormously large element of Freethinkers; who were so enthusiastic, and so well pleased at the result, that they hav now decided to hold a Freethinkers' picnic at Hamilton lakes as soon as the weather assumes a more genial aspect, which I hav promised to attend. I was glad indeed to meet with such a large number of Freethinkers here, some of whom I cannot recall, but among them were my host and hostess, Henry Mull, John Sawvell, Charles Meeks, and the editor of the Weekly Democrat. A party gathered together at the house of Mr. Saltsman on New Year's eve, and a very pleasant time was spent until the new year came upon us. Everyone expressed the greatest satisfaction at the result of my lectures, and promising to visit them again at an early date, I took my departure for Angola, a town situated fifteen miles north of Waterloo.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Ingersoll to the Unitarian Association.

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: In the first place, I wish to tender my thanks to this club for having generosity and sense enough to invite me to speak this evening. [Laughter.] It is probably the best thing the club has ever done. [Renewed laughter.] You hav shown that you are not afraid of a man simply because he does not happen to agree entirely with you [applause], although in a very general way it may be said that I come within one of you. [Continued laughter.]

So I think not only that you hav honored me—that I most cheerfully and gratefully admit—but, upon my word, I think that you hav honored yourselvs. [Laughter and applause.] And imagin the distance the religious world has traveled in the last few years to make a thing of this kind possible! [Applause.] You know—I presume every one of you knows—that I hav no religion—not enough to last a minute—[laughter]—none whatever—that is, in the ordinary sense of that word. And yet you hav become so nearly civilized [a smile] that you are willing to hear what I hav to say; and I hav become so nearly civilized [audible smiles] that I am willing to say what I think. [Laughter and applause.]

And, in the second place, let me say that I hav great respect for the Unitarian church. [Applause.] I hav great respect for the memory of Theodore Parker. [Renewed applause.] I hav great respect for every man who has assisted in reaving the heavens of an infinit monster. [Repeated applause.] I hav great respect for every man who has helped to put out the fires of hell. [Loud applause.] In other words, I hav great respect for every man who has tried to civilize my race. [Applause.]

The Unitarian church has done more than any other church—and maybe more than all other churches—to substitute character for creed [applause] and to say that a man should be judged by his spirit; by the climate of his heart; by the autumn of his generosity; by the spring of his hope; that he should be judged by what he does; by the influence that he exerts, rather than by the mythology he may believe. [Loud applause.] And whether there be one God or a million, I am perfectly satisfied that every duty that devolves upon me is within my reach. [Continued applause.] It is something that I can do myself, without the help of anybody else, either in this world or any other. [Great applause.]

Now, in order to make myself plain on this subject—I think I was to speak about the Ideal—I want to thank the Unitarian church for what it has done; and I want to thank the Universalist church, too. [Applause.] They at least believe in a God who is a gentleman [laughter and applause]; and that is much—more than was ever done by an orthodox church. [Applause.] They believe, at least, in a heavenly father who will leave the latch-string out until the last child gets home [applause and laughter]; and as that lets me in—especially in reference to the "last"—I hav great respect for that church. [Applause.]

Now, let me lay down this proposition No. 1. The imagination of man has the horizon of experience; and beyond experience or nature man cannot go, even in imagination. Man is not a creator. He combines; he adds together; he divides; he subtracts; he does not create, even in the world of imagination. Let me make myself a little plainer: Not one here—not one in the wide, wide world—can think of a color that he never saw. No human being can imagin a sound that he has not heard, and no one can think of a taste that he has not experienced. He can add to—that is, add together—combine; but he cannot, by any possibility, create.

Man originally, we will say—go back to the age of barbarism—and you will not hav to go far [laughter]; our own childhood, probably, is as far as is necessary—but go back to what is called the age of savagery. Every man was an idealist, as every man is to-day an idealist. Every man in savage or civilized time, commencing with the first that ever crawled out of a cave and pushed the hair back from his forehead to look at the sun—commence with him and end with Judge Wright—the last expression on the God question—and from that cave to the soul that livs in this temple everyone has been an idealist and has endeavored to account in some way for what he saw and for what he felt; in other words, for the phenomena of nature.

The cheapest way to account for it by the rudest savage is the very way it has been accounted for to-night. What makes the river run? There's a god in it. What makes the tree grow? There's a god in it. There's a god in the tree. What makes the star shine? There's a god in it. What makes the sun rise? Why, he's a god himself [laughter]; and the moon. And what makes the nightingale sing until the air is faint with melody? There's a god in it.

They commenced making gods to account for everything that happens—gods of dreams and gods of love and friendship, and wars and heroism and courage. Splendid! They kept making more and more. The more they found out in nature, up to a certain point, the more gods they needed; and they kept on making gods until almost every wave of the sea bore a god. Gods on every mountain, and in every vale and field, and by every stream! Gods in flowers, gods in grass; gods everywhere! All accounting for this world and for what happened in this world.

Then, when they had got about to the top, when their ingenuity had been exhausted, they had not produced anything, and they did not produce anything beyond their own experience. We are told that they were idolators. That is a mistake, except in the sense that we are all idolators. They said, "Here is a god; let us express our idea of him. He is stronger than a man is; let us giv him the body of a lion. He is swifter than a man is; let us giv him the wings of an eagle. He is wiser than a man is"—and when man was very savage he said, "Let us giv him the head of a serpent. A serpent is wonderfully wise; he travels without feet; he climbs without claws; he livs without food, and he is of the simplest conceivable form."

And that was simply to represent their idea of power, of swiftness, of wisdom. And yet this impossible monster was simply made of what man had seen in nature, and he put the various attributes or parts together by his imagination. He created nothing. He simply took these parts of certain beasts, when beasts were supposed to be superior to man in some particulars, and in that way expressed his thought.

You go into the territory of Arizona to-day, and you will find there pictures of God. He was clothed in stone, through which no arrow could pierce, and so they called God the Stone-Shirted, whom no Indian could kill. That was for the simple and only reason that it was impossible to get an arrow through his armor. They got the idea from the armadillo.

Now, I am simply saying this to show that they were making gods for all these centuries, and making them out of something they found in nature. Then, after they got through with the beast business, they made gods after the image of man. And they are the best gods, so far as I know, that hav been made.

So that—but you all know it as well as I do, or you wouldn't be Unitarians—all this has been simply a growth from year to year, from generation to generation, from age to age. And let me tell you the first thing about these gods that they made after the image of men. After a time there were men on the earth who were better than these gods in heaven. [Applause.]

Then those gods began to die, one after another, and dropped from their thrones. The time will probably come in the history of this world when an insurance company can calculate the average life of gods as well as they do now of men. [Laughter and applause.] Exactly! because all these gods hav been made by folks. And, let me say right here, the folks did the best they could. I do not blame them. [Laughter.] Everybody in the business has always done his best. [Laughter.] I admit it. [Renewed laughter.] I admit that man has traveled from the first conception up to Unitarianism by a necessary road. Under the conditions he could hav come up in no other way. I admit all that. I blame nobody. [Laughter.] But I am simply trying to tell, in a very feeble manner, how it is.

Now, in a little while, I say, men got better than their gods. Then the gods began to die. Then we began to find out a few things in nature, and we found out that we were supporting more gods than were necessary—that fewer gods could do the business—[laughter]—and that, from an economical point of view, expenses ought to be cut down. [Renewed laughter and applause.] There were too many temples, too many priests, and you always had to giv tithes of something to each one, and these gods were about to eat up the substance of the world.

And there came a time when it got to that point that either the gods would eat up the people or the people must destroy some gods, and of course they destroyed the gods—one by one—and in their places they put forces of nature to do the business—forces of nature that needed no church, that needed no theologians. Forces of nature that you are under no obligation to; that you do not hav to pay anything to keep working. [Laughter.] We found that the attraction of gravitation would attend to its business, night and day, at its own expense. [Laughter and applause.] There was a great saving. [Laughter.] I wish it was the same with all kinds of law, so that we could all go into some useful business, including myself. [Renewed laughter.]

I say they found this. So, day by day, they dispensed with this expense of deities; and the world got along just as well—a good deal better. [Laughter.] They used to think—a community thought—that if a man was allowed to say a word against a deity that the God would visit his vengeance upon the entire nation. But they found out, after a while, that no harm came of it; so they went on destroying the gods. Now, all these things are relativ; and they made gods a little better all the time—I admit that—till we struck the Presbyterian, which is probably the worst ever made. The Presbyterians seem to hav bred back. [Laughter and applause.]

But no matter. As man became more just, or nearer just; as he became more charitable, or nearer charitable, his god grew to be a little better and a little better. He was very bad in Geneva—the three that we then had. They were very bad in Scotland—horrible! [Laughter.] Very bad in New England—infamous! [Renewed laughter.] Might as well tell the truth about it—very bad! And then men went to work, finally, to civilize their gods, to civilize heaven, to giv heaven the benefit of the freedom of this brave world. That's what we did. [Laughter and applause.] We wanted to civilize religion—civilize what is known as Christianity. And nothing on earth needed civilization more; and nothing needs it more than that to-night. [Applause.] Civilization! I am not so much for the freedom of religion as I am for the religion of freedom. [Applause.]

Now, there was a time when our ancestors—good people, away back, all dead, no great regret expressed at this meeting on that account—there was a time when our ancestors were happy in their belief that nearly everybody was to be lost, and that a few, including themselvs, were to be saved. [Laughter and applause.] That religion, I say, fitted that time. It fitted their geology. It was a very good running mate for their astronomy. [Laughter.] It was a good match for their chemistry. [Renewed laughter.] In other words they were about equal in every department of human ignorance. [Laughter.]

And they insisted that there lived up there somewhere—generally up—exactly where nobody has, I believe, yet said—a being, an infinit person "without body, parts, or passions." And yet without passions he was angry at the wicked every day. Without body he inhabited a certain place, and without parts he was, after all, in some strange and miraculous manner, organized so that he thought.

And I don't know that it is possible for anyone here—I don't know that anyone here is gifted with imagination enough to conceive of such a being. Our fathers had not imagination enough to do so, at least, and so they said of this God that he loves and he hates; he punishes and he rewards; and that religion has been described perfectly to-night by Judge Wright as really making God a monster and men poor hopeless victims. And the highest possible conception of the orthodox man was, finally, to be a good servant—just lucky enough to get in—feathers somewhat singed, but enough left to fly. That was the idea of our fathers. And then came these divisions, simply because men began to think.

And why did they begin to think? Because in every direction, in all departments, they were getting more and more and more information. And then the religion did not fit. When they found out something of the history of this globe they found out that the scriptures were not true. I will not say not inspired, because I do not know whether they are inspired or not. It is a question, to me, of no possible importance, whether they are inspired or not. The question is, "Are they true?" If they are true, they do not need inspiration; and if they are not true inspiration will not help them. So that is a matter that I care nothing about.

On every hand, I say, they studied and thought. They began to grow—to hav new ideas of mercy, kindness, justice; new ideas of duty—new ideas of life. The old gods, after we got past the civilization of the Greeks—past their mythology, and it is the best mythology that man has ever made—the best (after we got past that), I say—the gods cared very little about women. Women occupied no place in the state—no place by the hearth, except one of subordination, and almost of slavery. So the early churches made God after that image who held women in contempt. It was only natural (I am not blaming anybody)—they had to do it, it was part of the must! [Laughter.]

Now, I say that we hav advanced up to the point that we demand, not only intelligence, but justice and mercy, in the sky; we demand that—that idea of God. [Applause.] Then comes my trouble—my trouble. I want to be honest about it. Here is my trouble—and I want it also understood that if I should see a man praying to a stone image or to a stuffed serpent, with that man's wife or daughter or son lying at the point of death, and that poor savage on his knees imploring that image or that stuffed serpent to save his child or his wife, there is nothing in my heart that could suggest the slightest scorn, or any other feeling than of sympathy—any other feeling than that of grief that the stuffed serpent could not answer the prayer and that the stone image did not feel. I want that understood. [Applause.] And wherever man prays for the right—no matter to whom or to what he prays; where he prays for strength to conquer the wrong, I hope his prayer may be heard; and if I think there is no one to hear it I will hear it, and I am willing to help answer it to the extent of my power. [Loud applause.]

So I want it distinctly understood that that is my feeling. But here is my trouble: I find this world made on a very cruel plan. I do not say it is wrong—I just say that it is the way it seems to me. I may be wrong myself, because this is the only world I was ever in; I am provincial. This grain of sand and tear they call the earth is the only world I hav ever lived in. And you hav no idea how little I know about the rest of this universe; and you never will know how little I know about it until you examin your own minds on the same subject. [Laughter.]

The plan is this: Life feeds on life. Justice does not always triumph. Innocence is not a perfect shield. There is my trouble; there is my trouble. No matter, now, whether you agree with me or not; I beg of you to be honest and fair with me in your thought as I am toward you in mine. That is my trouble.

I hope, as devoutly as you, that there is a power somewhere in this universe that will finally bring everything as it should be. I take a little consolation in the "perhaps"—in the guess that this is only one scene of a great drama, and that when the curtain rises on the fifth act, if I liv that long, I may see the coherence and the relation of things. But up to the present writing—or speaking—I do not. I do not understand it—a God that has life feed on life; every joy in the world born of some agony! I do not understand why in this world, over the Niagara of cruelty, should run this flood of blood. I do not understand it. [Applause.] And, then, why does not justice always triumph? Why is not innocence a perfect shield? These are my troubles.

Suppose a man had control of the atmosphere, knew enough of the secrets of nature, had read enough in "nature's infinit book of secresy" so that he could control the rain and wind; suppose a man had that power, and suppose that last year he kept the rain from Russia and did not allow the crops to ripen, when hundreds of thousands are famishing and when little babes are found with their lips on the breasts of dead mothers! What would you think of such a man? Now, there is my trouble. If there be a God he understood this. He knew when he withheld his rain that the famin would come. He saw the dead mothers, he saw the empty breasts of death and he saw the helpless babes. There is my trouble. I am perfectly frank with you and honest. That is my trouble.

Now understand me! I do not say there is no God. I do not know. As I told you before I hav traveled but very little—only in this world.

I want it understood that I do not pretend to know. I say I think. And in my mind the idea expressed by Judge Wright so eloquently and so beautifully is not exactly true. I cannot conceive of the God he endeavors to describe, because he givs to that God will, purpose, achievement, benevolence, love, and no form—no organization—no wants. There's the trouble. No wants. And let me say why that is a trouble—anybody can move to adjourn now at any moment [laughter]—I will tell you why that is a trouble. Man acts only because he wants. You civilize man by increasing his wants, or as his wants increase he becomes civilized. You find a lazy savage who would not hunt an elephant tusk to save your life. But let him hav a few tastes of whisky and tobacco, and he will run his legs off for tusks. [Laughter.] You hav given him another want and he is willing to work. [Renewed laughter.] And they nearly all started on the road toward Unitarianism—that is to say, toward civilization—in that way. You must increase their wants. [Applause.]

The question arises, "Can an infinit being want anything?" If he does, and cannot get it, he is not happy. If he does not want anything, I cannot help him. I am under no obligation to do anything for anybody who does not need anything and who does not want anything. Now, there is my trouble. I may be wrong, and I may get paid for it some time [laughter], but that is my trouble.

I do not see—admitting that all is true that has been said about the existence of God—I do not see what I can do for him; and I do not see either—I can giv my word of honor—what he can do for me, judging by what he has done for others. I do not.

And then I come to the other point, that religion so-called explains our duties to this supposed being, and we do not even know that he exists, and no human being has got imagination enough to describe him, or to use such words that you understand what he is trying to say. I hav listened with great pleasure to Judge Wright this evening, and I hav heard a great many other beautiful things on the same subject—none better than his. But I never understood them—never. [Laughter.]

Now, then, what is religion? I say, religion is all here in this world—right here—and that all our duties are right here to our fellow-men; that the man that builds a home; marries the girl that he loves; takes good care of her; likes the family; stays home nights, as a general thing; pays his debts; tries to find out what he can; gets all the ideas and beautiful things that his mind will hold; turns a part of his brain into a gallery of the fine arts; has a host of statues there and paintings; then has another niche devoted to music—a magnificent dome, filled with winged notes that rise to glory—now the man who does that gets all he can from the great ones dead; swaps all the thoughts he can with the ones that are alive; true to the ideal that he has got here in his brain—he is what I call a religious man, because he makes the world better, happier; he puts the dimples of joy in the cheeks of the ones he loves, and he lets the gods run heaven to suit themselvs. [Great laughter and applause.]

And I am not saying that he is right; I do not know. [Laughter.]

That is all the religion that I hav. It is to make somebody else happier if I can. I do not mean to take any great trouble about it, but if I can do it easily—[long laughter] that, it seems to me, is all there is of real religion.

I divide this world into two classes—the cruel and the kind; and I think a thousand times more of a kind man than I do of an intelligent man. I think more of kindness than I do of genius. I think more of real good human nature in that way—of one who is willing to lend a helping hand and who goes through the world with a face that looks like its owner was willing to answer a decent question—I think a thousand times more of that than I do of being theologetically right; because I do not care whether I am theologetically right or not. [Laughter.] It is something that is not worth talking about, because it is something that I never, never, never will understand; and every one of you will die and you won't understand it, either—until after you die at any rate. I do not know what will happen then.

I am not denying anything. There is another ideal, and it is a beautiful ideal. It is the greatest dream that ever entered the heart or brain of man—the Dream of Immortality. It was born of human affection. It did not come to us from heaven. It was born of the human heart. And when he who loved kissed the lips of her who was dead there came into his heart the Dream "We may meet again." [Great applause.]

And, let me tell you, that Hope of Immortality never came from any religion. That hope of Immortality has helped make religion. It has been the great oak around which hav climbed the poisonous vines of superstition—that Hope of Immortality is the great oak. [Long-continued applause.]

And yet the moment a man expresses a doubt about the truth of Joshua or Jonah or the other three fellows in a furnace, up hops some poor little wretch and says, "Why, he doesn't want to liv any more; he wants to die and go down like a dog, and that is the end of him and his wife and children." [Laughter and applause.] They really seem to think that the moment a man is what they call an Infidel he has no affections, no heart, no feeling, no hope—nothing—nothing. Just anxious to be annihilated! But, if the orthodox creed be true, I make my choice to-night. I take hell. [Great laughter and applause.] And if it is between hell and annihilation, I take annihilation.

I will tell you why I take hell in making the first choice. We hav heard from both of those places—heaven and hell—according to the New Testament. There was a rich man in hell, and a poor man, Lazarus, in heaven. And there was another gentleman by the name of Abraham. And the rich man in hell was in flames, and he called for water, and they told him they couldn't giv him any. No bridge! But they did not express the slightest regret that they could not giv him any water. Mr. Abraham was not decent enough to say he would if he could; no, sir; nothing. It did not make any difference to him. [Laughter.] But this rich man in hell—in torment—his heart was all right, for he remembered his brothers; and he said to this Abraham, "If you cannot go, why, send a man to my five brethren, so that they will not come to this place!" Good fellow, to think of his five brothers when he was burning up. Good fellow. Best fellow we ever heard from on the other side—in either world.

So, I say, there is my place. And, incidentally, Abraham at that time gave his judgment as to the value of miracles. He said, "Though one should arise from the dead he wouldn't help your five brethren!" "There are Moses and the prophets." No need of raising people from the dead.

That is my idea, in a general way, about religion; and I want the imagination to go to work upon it, taking the perfections of one church, of one school, of one system, and putting them together, just as the sculptor makes a great statue by taking the eyes from one, the nose from another, the limbs from another, and so on; just as they make a great painting from a landscape by putting a river in this place, instead of over there, changing the location of a tree and improving on what they call nature—that is to say, simply by adding to, taking from, that is all we can do. But let us go on doing that until there shall be a church in sympathy with the best human heart and in harmony with the best human brain.

And, what's more, let us hav that religion for the world we liv in. Right here! [Applause.] Let us hav that religion until it cannot be said that they that do the most work hav the least to eat. Let us hav that religion here until hundreds and thousands of women are not compelled to make a living with the needle that has been called "the asp for the breast of the poor," and to liv in tenements, in filth, where modesty is impossible. [Applause.]

I say, let us preach that religion here until men will be ashamed to hav forty or fifty millions, or any more than they need, while their brethren lack bread—while their sisters die from want. [Great applause.] Let us preach that religion here until man will hav more ambition to become wise and good than to become rich and powerful. [Applause.] Let us preach that religion here among ourselvs until there are no abused and beaten wives. [Applause.] Let us preach that religion until children are no longer afraid of their own parents and until there is no back of a child bearing the scars of a father's lash. [Continued applause.] Let us preach it, I say, until we understand and know that every man does as he must, and that, if we want better men and women, we must hav better conditions. [Loud applause.]

Let us preach this grand religion until everywhere, the world over, men are just and kind to each other. [Renewed applause.] And then, if there be another world, we will be prepared for it. [Applause.] And if I come into the presence of an infinit, good, and wise being, he will say, "Well, you did the best you could. You did very well, indeed. There is plenty of work for you to do here. Try and get a little higher than you were before." [Applause.] Let us preach that one drop of restitution is worth an ocean of repentance.

And if there is a Life of Eternal Progress before us, I shall be as glad as any other angel to find that out. [Laughter and applause.]

But I will not sacrifice the world I hav for one I know not of. [Great applause.] I will not liv here in fear, when I do not know that that which I fear livs. [Applause.]

I am going to liv a perfectly free man. I am going to reap the harvest of my mind, no matter how poor it is [laughter], whether it is wheat or corn or worthless weeds. [Renewed laughter.] And I am going to scatter it. [Laughter and applause.] Some may "fall on stony ground." [Laughter.] But I think I hav struck good soil to-night. [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

And so, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you a thousand times for your attention. I beg that you will forgiv the time that I hav taken, and allow me to say, once more, that this event marks an epoch in Religious Liberty in the United States. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Letters of Friends.

Kind Wishes for Reform and for Us.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to congratulate you upon the neat appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER in entering upon the threshold of a new year. May the new year be a bright and prosperous one to you and the noble paper you are conducting, and may its new dress be the means of adding to your subscription list.

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

A Lamb Amid Wolves.

COOPERSTOWN, N. Y., Jan. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We are the only family who take your paper in Cooperstown. I think I could influence friends to take it or read it if there were no pictures. As for myself they do not disturb me in the least, for I am a Liberal. All my Freethought reading except your paper is lent out all the time. Only two families besides ourselvs read your paper. I am in favor of pictures, but in the form of books or albums. I think your paper the best I ever read. I do not argue my belief, though I could, but season my conversation with it whenever I can nicely.

Yours truly, MRS. LAWRENCE KAPLE.

Mr. Bowtell's Experience.

Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. E. J. Bowtell in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 19th records an interesting experience which stands on its own merits, but in connection with it he theorizes a doctrin of pantheism that has the air rather of a preconception than of logical deduction from the experiences stated. Admitting these as facts, they presuppose a medium of vibration for thought analogous to the known atmosphere as a medium for those of sound and light; but that is not what Mr. Bowtell's language suggests. His is what I should expect to find in Spiritualists who are bent on sustaining the god idea. It is my impression that this divine squint was honorably absent from A. J. Davis's first book. How is that? M. E. L.

Deceived.

YORK, PA., Dec. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read a great many books published by the Truth Seeker Company, and was once a whole-hearted believer in the doctrin of them. I am not as strong a believer in your views as I once was, for this reason: There is a man living in Dillsburg, Pa., who had sixteen running sores for years standing; could not do a day's work since they began. The doctors failed to giv him relief. He adopted the faith cure and was cured in one night. I did not believe it when I saw it in the papers, so I went to Dillsburg and saw the man personally and saw the scars on his leg. I am now confident he has been cured by faith. This man's name is Abram Fahle. I wish you would explain this and giv your opinion on it in your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me a copy. If you can throw any light on this I will be a regular subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will inclose you a copy of the Harrisburg Telegram in which I first read the account of this man's cure. You can read for yourself. Please giv me your views on this in THE TRUTH SEEKER and do not forget to send me a copy. Inclosed find twenty-five cents for your trouble.

A. S. LEHR.

[The story is like hundreds of other stories—alleged miracles. There is no evidence that it is true, for a scar on a man's leg proves nothing. Mr. Fahle lied some, the reporter lied more, and Mr. Lehr has been taken in.—ED. T. S.]

Rhyme and Reason.

ANGOLA, IND., Jan. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years, receiving it through our newsdealer. I look forward for the arrival of your paper as I would for a letter from my nearest friend.

We hav just had a stirring up in the way of two lectures by the talented young orator John R. Charlesworth. About six hundred attended the two lectures. Among them were quite a number of that class of people who call themselvs Christians. I think all of them fell below the high-water mark after listening to Mr. Charlesworth's unanswerable argument on "The Philosophy of Secularism." It was the universal verdict that the two lectures were the best ever given in our city. I can truthfully say, all Liberals desiring to advance the principles of Secularism in their community can secure no better talent than Mr. Charlesworth. We hope to secure his services again should he chance to be in Indiana.

There has never been such an awakening
  Of Freethought here before.
It is the general topic
  On the street and in the store.

I think the Christian's faith
  Has been a little shattered,
While it has strengthened us
  And we are not so badly scattered.

And now to organize a league
  We surely will commence.
Around each and every church
  We will build a high board fence.

And when our work has all been done
  We'll hire a Liberal teacher,
For in those future days to come
  There will be no need of preachers.

FREMONT ROBINSON.

Why Blush for So Noble a Cause?

WATERLOO, IND., Jan. 2, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: On the 30th and 31st of December we were treated to an intellectual feast by that refined and intelligent young gentleman, Mr. J. Charlesworth. I considered him a second Ingersoll, and this, I consider, is the highest compliment that I could pay him, but I assure you he is in every way worthy of it. He made many friends here; even the Christians were favorably impressed by his strong arguments, and their freedom from vulgarity. I only wish that there were many more like him in the lecture field. It is men like him that giv credit to the cause of Liberalism, with so little offense to all classes. He was met by crowded houses both nights. A resolution was offered in favor of keeping the World's Fair open on Sunday, and was carried by a unanimous vote.

There are a great many Liberals here. The trouble is, there are about two-thirds of them afraid to own the cause. Personally, I and my wife are proud of it. And why anyone should blush to own so noble a cause is past my comprehension. Friends hav warned me many times against so plainly avowing my Infidelity, but I can truthfully say that I cannot see that it has ever injured me in the least; it has never injured my business or my credit. I can get all the credit I want from Christians as well as Liberals, and I hav lots of friends among the Christians, too, and I believe they respect me far more than they do your poor, half-hearted, milk-and-water Liberals, who do in Rome as the Romans do. And right here I wish to speak a word of encouragement to all faint-hearted Liberals. Do not act as if you was ashamed of your honest convictions; be true to yourselvs, true to your country, and true to your cause, and always endeavor to be consistent and to keep the flag above the cross. Long life to THE TRUTH SEEKER and W. Heston. I am so sorry that any who call themselvs Liberals can be so ill-Liberal as to let themselvs get delinquent on your books. That they will begin the new year by paying up, is the wish of

Your true friend, JACOB SALTSMAN.

Tariff.

BURLINGTON, IA., Jan. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am a great admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, and hav received much pleasure and profit from reading his lectures and writings on Freethought and religion, but with some of the colonel's late utterances on political economy I hav been more amused than instructed, as they are about as wild and inconsistent as the utterances of the average sky-pilot on the question of religion.

Mr. Ingersoll says that if we would be prosperous as a people we must discourage foreign trade by putting a tariff on imports; and to prove this, a short time ago he introduced the people to a new and very curious method of book-keeping. And then shortly afterward he writes an article for the Illustrated World's Fair, in which he says: "Nations, like small communities, are in danger of becoming provincial, and must become so, unless they exchange commodities, theories, thoughts, and ideals. Isolation is the soil of ignorance, and ignorance is the soil of egotism, and nations, like individuals who liv apart, mistake provincialism for perfection, and hatred of all other nations for patriotism." And again, in an interview in the Cleveland Press, speaking of the work of foreign missions, he says: "Honest commerce will do a thousand times more good than all the missionaries on earth."

Now, the questions I would ask are:

1. Does not this nation by maintaining a tariff tax on imports impede the exchange of commodities between it and other nations, and are we not, therefore, in danger of becoming provincial?

2. Do we encourage "honest commerce" by building a Chinese wall around this country and placing a government officer at each gate with the power to demand a toll from those who wish to bring in commodities to exchange with us?

And until the above questions are answered satisfactorily I shall continue to think that on the tariff question "Our Bob" is like the average gospel-spouter on hellfire—he does more spouting than honest thinking. WILBUR MOSENA.

A Reformed Christian's Tale.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., Jan. 2, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Unfortunately for myself (and perhaps the world at large to some extent), I was born, cradled, and raised in a hot-bed of old Bible superstition and ignorance. Born sixty-three years ago and soon as able to get around well in the sphere above-stated, I was compelled to carry a missionary box around town to solicit and receive contributions under the auspices of the Methodist church ostensibly for the purpose of sending rum and missionaries to the heathen. Now, if I could hav been enlightened on the rum business at that period of life, I might hav freed myself from the miseries of sin and death, in place of being drawn along by the Methodist doctrin, such as "Hate your father and mother and cleave unto Christ," and all other such rot as is taught in the Christian world. But as it is it took me sixty years to find my way out of the dark stinkpots of superstition and hypocrisy. But thanks to the Liberal doctrin the scales hav fallen from my eyes. About three years ago I found THE TRUTH SEEKER at a neighbor's house, and began to read and think for myself; am now a full-fledged Freethinker and a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and expect to remain so during life. There are in and around this place upward of one hundred Freethinkers, good men and true, yet with three churches and their influence a great many are afraid to come to the front, owing to business and family relations, etc.; and in fact the churches hav got such a power over the women and children by preaching to them superstition and fox-fire, that the leaders of the hosts of Israel can well afford to say, Let the husband go to hell if he wants to, while at the same time they offer him a free gospel and appear to be very anxious for him to take it if he has got money enough to pay his way to the new Jerusalem.

I will send the money by our old friend, A. Lewis, for the Bible Picture Book. And we want blanks to throw our little influence toward keeping open those gates at the World's Fair in Chicago on Sunday. I hav given you this little experience for publication because there are tens of thousands of men that stand to-day as I did upon the dark edges of superstition looking for the true lights of Liberalism, and let me tell you they are coming in spite of all the bulwarks of cant and superstition that theology can erect.

Hoping you will long stand at the helm of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that Heston with his illuminating pictures may soon be able to spread the light from continent to continent, driving out superstition, rum, missionaries, and priestcraft,

GEORGE WHITAKER.

P.S.—I hav come to stay.

Nearly As Bad As a Priest.

DAVENPORT, WASH., Dec. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I write you this with the hope that you will publish the same, with the account of how I and many others hav been entrapped by a notorious agent representing the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York. The way he proceeds is to tell what a great benefit it is to insure in said company, and how many of the business men of your town hav taken out policies, namely, merchants and doctors, which proved to be entirely fictitious; how the company paid eight per cent on money invested with them. But after you get the policy it only reads four per cent, and if you hav not the cash he generously offers to pay your first payment for the consideration of a note to be paid in two or three months without interest. My note was due the 1st of December, and what was my astonishment to find that my note was on two per cent interest, which had run up to $13.90.

My reason for asking you to publish this is to warn others of this mean villain. He is now working in Palouse country, and I see in the Palouse Gazette that he is doing the farmers up to a lively tune. I was told in the bank that he was under contract with the company to procure policies to the amount of $1,000,000. Freethinkers, look out for him. His stay is short and decisiv, and the means he employs is disreputable in the extreme. His name while here was G. M. Fennell. He is of high stature, good-looking, representing himself while here as an English nobleman. He will in all probability work through Idaho, Montana, and the Dakotas. Freethinkers in these states take notice. Warn the people. Respectfully, P. SELDE.

From the following article taken from the Colfax Gazette, many will doubtless recognize the gentlemanly young agent who flourished in the Big Bend to the sorrow of a number of people this fall. The Gazette says:

Life insurance agents by the dozen hav swooped down upon the farmers of the Palouse during the last few weeks. The competition thus created has made it a common occurrence for three to ten agents a day to solicit policies from the same person, and the high standing which most of the agents occupy in business and social life has helped to giv the entire fraternity a similar position. But the gullible hav been gulled at last. George McCroskey seems to hav been the first victim, though others keep turning up one by one, claiming to hav paid for a policy that never came, or for one that does not embrace the contract as the agent represented it should.

The fellow who works so smoothly pretends to be employed by the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, and he distributes cards that usually convey the information that his name changes with a change of location; his address, Acton, London W., England. He was in Colfax a few days ago, and probably is now working some other Palouse town. The age of this high-stepper is about thirty years, and he is very "English, you know." His collar reaches high up on the back of his neck, completely hiding a big portion of him from the gaze of the world. There seems to be no doubt that he is a bona-fide agent, but his methods hav convinced a good many that he is not. When he corners a victim he tells the innocent granger or business man that he has purchased a large block of insurance in the Mutual Life Company, and wishes to place a certain amount of it in that locality, which he can afford to do at a very cheap rate because the large block was given him on very favorable terms. Ordinarily he has only a few thousand dollars left for the locality in which he is working, so he represents, and is willing to put it out at favorable terms. He figures up enormous profits for the person taking out the insurance; and if in due season the policy comes, it is an ordinary policy which the victims are not willing to accept, as the case was with George McCroskey.

The same fellow seems to hav left his footprints in California and Oregon.

Intended for "Freethought."

HONGKONG, CHINA, Oct. 26, 1891.

TO THE EDITOR OF FREETHOUGHT, Dear Sir: Please inform me which are the best and more impartial works about the origin of Christianity and the development of its sects, besides the works of Strauss and Renan. What do you think of Chastel Etienne's "Histoire du Christianisme?"

Are there many newspapers, reviews, or books published in Ceylon, in India, or elsewhere, in defense of Buddhism and of other Eastern creeds? Could you tell me if there is any real difference between Christianity and the so-called pagan religions? Could anyone quote a sound Christian doctrin or precept which had not been taught by some ancient religions or sages?

I hav lately read an interesting dissertation by J. Patouret, "La Condition Juridique de la Femme Dans L'ancienne Egypte." It is evident from the proofs adduced by the writer that Egyptian women formerly enjoyed far greater civil rights than do the women at present under Christian governments. Christian missionaries in China only succeed in converting a few ignorant and poor nativs, but some missions make a great deal of money and own large properties. Their members are known as being exceedingly troublesome. They do not follow all the injunctions and examples of Jesus. If a mob happens to destroy their chapel or insult them, they insist on getting an exorbitant sum of money and immense tracts of land for compensation. I hav heard politicians state that for carrying on intrigues a certain class of missionaries are cleverer than consuls, who dislike that kind of business. They need only very little encouragement from their government for them to stir up serious quarrels. All the wars in China hav been connected with the unbounded pretensions of the missionaries.

But not all the missions hav such a bad name. Some are of quiet disposition and very prudent.

China is truly the paradise of missionaries. They find their governments always ready to help them, although, as you are aware, the majority of European statesmen do not believe in Christianity.

Almost all the missionaries, except those who devote their time to cure poor Chinese or to teach sciences, are doing more harm than good to civilization. They are throwing, by their conduct before the eyes of rude people, more discredit on the religion which they preach than all the attacks of philosophers and Freethinkers.

Several Roman Catholic missionaries hav declared that they enjoy more liberty in China than in any Catholic country, yet they appear not to be satisfied. I believe they want to rule not only the consciences of the believers, but also the whole world.

Chinese government, like that of old Rome, does not interfere with religious liberty. It is said that all Chinese scholars are either Agnostics or Atheists.

Chinese welcome foreign merchants, as they understand the value of having good trade. How can people who hav not been reared in Christian superstitions and those who reason well accept Christianity, when its very foundation is false, and the whole Bible is full of absurdities and contradictions?

The doctrin of the original sin is a foolish myth which the Jews had copied from their conquerors the Babylonians. We know for a certainty that death could not be the result of the punishment, as asserted in the Bible. Millions of years before the apparition of man, animals had lived, struggled, and died in the same way as we see them now.

Nor does this earth differ much from countless other worlds.

Scientific discoveries will completely dispel the few remaining biblical myths.

The numerous Christian sects, differing in many vital points and which hav been the cause of long and bloody contentions, the animosity which these sects bear to each other shows that Christians are not sure about the tenets of Christianity.

Chinese laugh at the pretensions of those who think of converting the "heathen."

As long as people would or pretend to believe in so-called revealed religions there is no hope of abolishing wars, of improving the condition of the laboring class, and lessening other evils. All those religions hav been and are the curse of the world. The great poet and profound thinker rightly exclaimed, "Tantum potuit religio malorum suadere!"

The only true religion, and that which will survive all others, is that of Humanity. I believe the reason why China, unlike other ancient nations, has not disappeared and is full of vitality, is because her legislature had the common sense to reject the farce of adopting a "supernatural religion." I remain, dear sir, yours truly,

TRAVELER.

Ingersoll as a Theorist.

HARTFORD, KAN., Dec. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There is scarcely anything in the derogatory line which one cannot hear concerning Colonel Ingersoll. A few years ago a leading Kansas City newspaper published under boastful headlines the statement of a prominent railroad official to the effect that Mr. Ingersoll was a rabid rebel in sentiment during the late war of the Rebellion. But only a few days ago a pensioned soldier told me that was all a mistake; that Ingersoll was a Unionist always; but, for the glory of God and Methodism, he added that he had been told by others that Mr. Ingersoll showed himself a coward on the battlefield. I think that if there had been any truth in this latter assertion Mr. Ingersoll would hav gone over to the popular church party long ago; for, as a Campbellite evangelist recently admitted, that is the place where cowards and hypocrits flourish, and there are no hypocrits among Infidels.

Mr. Ingersoll says that the man who first accused him of predicting the downfall of the churches in ten years has taken the lie back; but it will nevertheless be reiterated to the end of superstition's reign, just as the base lies about Paine and Voltaire are told, without proof and against proof.

It is now asserted, in the face of his own flat declarations again and again to the contrary, that Mr. Ingersoll opposes all marriage laws. This assertion will no doubt be believed, as most other things are believed, without evidence, by church people, and will be used in sermons and Sunday-school lessons to frighten big and little children away from Infidelity.

When the Christian world felt the stalwart blows of this apostle of freedom and manhood shaking the platforms under their feet, and dared not meet him upon the rostrum, they invited discussion within their own chosen arena. It had been confidently claimed that Mr. Ingersoll was a shallow reasoner; that his oratorical powers alone gave him prestige; and that he could not endure the ordeal of a calm and logical sifting of his arguments in the columns of the great monthly and quarterly reviews. Well, the ordeal was accepted, eagerly courted, and triumphantly sustained. The peerless champions of orthodoxy who instituted that ordeal were the ones who retired from it in discomfiture and disgrace. Their acknowledged failure to verify their own predictions stamps them as the successors of the false prophets of ecclesiastical history, and the fabricators of the slanders which they hav heaped, and are heaping, upon the characters and memories of honest men. Their silence alone, after the issue of such a momentous conflict, would be sufficient to declare their views of the result, but some of them hav even broken that silence to affirm the disastrous finale of their cherished hopes. Among the lovers of truth and defenders of liberty throughout the ages Robert G. Ingersoll stands preëminent. Solid and brilliant, good and great in everything, he is as worthy of the plaudits of emancipated men and women of the nineteenth century as Gibbon the majestic writer, Voltaire the caustic critic, Hume the philosophical essayist, or Paine, the bold enunciator of axiomatic common sense, were of the comparativly dark ages in which they lived.

Of late years there has sprung up in the ranks of reform a mushroom rabble, comparable only to the Flagellants of the sixteenth or the Robespierre faction of the eighteenth century, who cannot patiently endure the existence of law, order, decency, rationality, or stability in the world; and so, as per consequence, each of these hobbyists must assail Mr. Ingersoll and berate him for his inability to confine himself to their narrow apprehensions. The obscenist rails at him for his decency, the Spiritist for his rationality, the Anarchist for his appreciation of the blessings of peace, law, and order; and the Communist and paternalist are unhappy because Mr. Ingersoll cannot consistently fall in with their wild vagaries. Truly Mr. Ingersoll is having a hard time to please the whimsical Dame Grundy within Freethought lines; for

> Was ever maiden in such humor wooed?
> Was ever maiden in such humor won?

In your issue for December 26th Mr. Gleason takes the colonel in hand, somewhat like a schoolboy trying to spank his teacher, and endeavors to instruct his preceptor in the first principles of finance. It seems to me that, whether Mr. Gleason is a practical farmer or not, it would be much better if he would first instruct himself in the principles of farming before he undertakes to lecture anybody upon the tariff question. When he asserts that "the raw material in a bushel of corn is not worth one-tenth of a mill," is he not aware of the fact that corn grows from the seed and that it requires on an average about two and one-half mills' worth of forty-cent corn as seed from which to raise a bushel of corn in Kansas? Besides this, it requires about eight square rods of land, worth, say, $1. In New York or Massachusetts the land would be worth much more, even in its raw state. And when he givs us to understand that the relativ profits from marketing corn as corn or as pork, beef, and horses depend entirely on the relativ price of each, has he forgotten one of the first elements of profitable farming, the principle that grain impoverishes while live stock enriches the soil?

Passing now more directly to the tariff issue, when Mr. Gleason asks, "Would it not be a good thing to giv a bounty for every bushel of corn or wheat raised in the United States?" we may well answer that a protectiv tariff on imported corn and wheat, the amount ad valorem of which was doubled at the last session of Congress, accomplishes, as has been abundantly proved in reference to all imported products, exactly the same result as a bounty when it excludes competing foreign products and thereby raises the price of the article raised at home, all of which is done without the evils of taxation incident to a bounty. The producer receives his bounty in the shape of an increase in the price of his produce, which the foreigner pays in the shape of either a reduction in the price of the article which he sends here to sell, or in a diminished market for his produce, or both. You may ask how he pays it when he ceases to contribute to our market altogether. The answer to this is that he pays it by transferring his profit on sales in our markets to the producer in the United States.

In his remarks on the question of steel rails Mr. Gleason runs wide of his bearings. The ton of steel rails, which he supposes to hav been traded for seventy-five bushels of corn, constituted actual wealth to the manufacturers, and enabled them to liv, not only without competing with the farmer, but actually by helping to furnish the farmer with a market for his corn. If the farmer had been compelled to purchase (through the railroad companies, of course, in the shape of fares and freights) his ton of steel rails abroad, he would hav sold on a glutted market instead of a grasping market in Liverpool, and would not hav been able to realize even the $25 on his seventy bushels of corn which was necessary to buy the English rails. Why? Simply because the steel rail manufacturers in the United States would not be making steel rails but farming, raising corn to glut the foreign market and lower the price. This has been the history of every trial of free trade everywhere, and those who are not so blind as to perpetually study maxims instead of markets are aware of the fact. The nations of the world know that we are increasing in wealth faster than any other nation, that our laborers are better fed, clothed, and educated, and they attribute the fact to our protectiv tariff. The last of the colonies of Great Britain has deserted her—has renounced her free-trade policy, and the farmers of England clamor for protection. English Cobdenites expend annually hundreds of thousands of dollars to advertise free trade, while English citizens and laborers are starving and rioting in their streets, destitute of help or employment. When the resurrection morn for truthful ideas arrives, Mr. Gleason will find his theories rated as "wood, hay, stubble."

The free-trade policy is the policy which English theorists hav always advocated for Americans. When they had the power, the English enforced that policy among us. I hardly know how to characterize the ignorance or mendacity of the opposit assertion.

When $2,500,000,000 worth of farm produce is consumed in any country, it is worth that amount to the people of that country, or that amount would not be paid for it; and the same assertion is true of an equal value's worth of manufactures, or anything else. The same values would not hold good under free trade, for manufacturing would decline to somewhere near zero, while farm production would reach such a stagnation as an exhaustless surplus would necessarily engender. Our country would retrograde in wealth, intelligence, and morality, and our population be gradually relegated to anarchy, pauperism, and barbarity.

Mr. Gleason makes the astonishing assertion that the American farmer cannot compete with the Russian farmer in wheat-growing, because he is charged nearly twice as much for his machinery, either ignorantly or in defiance of the testimony of our American consul and others who inform us that the machinery of the same kinds and quality used by European farmers costs them one-third more than the same machinery sells for in the United States. Free-trade theorizers are only half converted from orthodox methods. They reason precisely as the theologian does, starting with some unproved assumption and building their theories upon it. The bottom fact of the free-traders is the assumption that a tariff duty upon an imported article is of necessity a tax paid by the consumer upon every article of that kind sold in the country imposing the duty—which is no fact at all, but a fallacy which is being exploded everywhere, which is demonstrated to the satisfaction of everybody but human moles or self-made bats, who will not see anything revealed by the sunlight. The fact is, we hav never extensivly manufactured an article in the United States without eventually, if not immediately, reducing the price not only of the home-made article below what we ever could buy it for abroad, but also of the foreign-made article in our markets to the level of the home-made, minus the tariff duty. Protection has cheapened and will cheapen the price to us of everything which we now buy abroad, and which we possess the necessary facilities for successfully making at home in such quantities as will supply our own markets.

"It will hardly do to say your theory is all right but you cannot put it in practice," says Mr. Gleason, and I advise him and all other free-trade visionaries to smoke that cud in their own pipes, for their theory has never yet in the history of the world been applied without disastrous consequences. Thos. Benton, a revenue-tariff Democrat, admits that destroying the protectiv features of the tariff of 1828 was one of the causes of the hard times which began in 1837.

As to Mr. Ingersoll's alleged heresies in advocating good money instead of shinplasters, I hav already stated, in a previous number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, what I consider the basic principles of finance, and will not repeat here what I then said, and what no one has seen fit to attempt to refute, except to state that money is that which possesses value in itself, and that the kind of money Mr. Gleason thinks the government makes is simply a promissory note or certificate of indebtedness, possessing no more value on earth than that of the Christian would in heaven without a redeemer. Flooding the country with promissory notes and trafficking upon the people's indebtedness would be the quickest way of unsettling all values and precipitating universal bankruptcy.

I think Mr. Ingersoll is entitled to respect yet awhile in politics as well as religion.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Ned and His Sled.

A little Ned once had a sled,
And kept it in his father's shed,
And while this Ned was in his bed,
Down came the snow from overhead.

When morning came he rubbed his eyes,
And looking out he soon espies
The snow that came down from the skies.
"Oh, dress me, mother, quick!" he cries.

Soon little Ned was on his feet,
And dressed from top to toe complete.
His mother kissed his lips so sweet,
And let him out into the street.

Then little Ned took down his sled,
And, meditating, soon he said,
"I'll go and call Jim, Joe, and Fred."
And off to Jim and Joe he sped.

Jim, Joe, and Fred and little Ned
Hied to the hill beyond the mead.
Decided who should go ahead—
Down went all four as quick as said.

'Twas plain each one enjoyed the fun,
But now the uphill work begun.
One way they could go by the run,
But uphill work they could not shun.

Each took the bitter with the sweet,
For from the task there's no retreat;
So up the hill eight little feet
Pressed onward, proud of such a feat.

Not long they wait but soon decide
To hav another rushing slide,
So, swiftly rushing side by side,
Ned's sled upon a sudden shied

Across the track, and so collided,
Against which they had not provided,
And all with one accord decided
That Ned his sled had badly guided.

To meet so soon with such rebuff
Ned thought such play was rather rough;
Of uphill work he'd had enough,
And downhill summersaults were tough.

So feeling rather sad within,
Said he: "I'll not try this again;
For sliding I don't care a pin!"
And turned him homeward with chagrin.

The other boys stood still to see
With eyes as big as eyes could be—
What Ned could mean. To think that he Should quit the sport and leave the three!

Their faces all looked rather wry,
For Ned would not the third time try;
Nor did he bid the three good-bye,
And none could tell the reason why.

Warmed by the early rising sun,
And sliding had but just begun,
The triple urchins all as one
Said: "Now we three will hav some fun!"

Ned, when he left the other boys,
Could hardly keep his equipoise;
And yet he made but little noise,
Which many another boy employs.

But hastening home he saw his ma,
And by her side this Edward's pa
Stood in the doorway ajar,
For Eddie's home was not afar.

"What luck," said pa, "has my son had?"
"I guess," said ma, "his luck was bad;
At any rate your face looks sad;
But tobogging should make you glad."

Ned up and told her all about it
Loud as his little tongue could spout it
And then as loud as he could shout it
Declared he'd rather go without it.

My Dream.

On the 31st of December I had thought of making resolutions, but was greatly discouraged by having made them before and broken them. Then in a fit of despondency I said to myself: "Why do I care to make myself better? I am only a girl; besides, there are so many such as I; I am but a drop in the bucket. When I die the world will go on just as before; and as there is so much—so much—to learn, I will just quit where I hav begun. Let me liv in quiet and content, and that will be all anyone will ask of me."

Everyone is liable at times to get stuck in the "slough of despond." How many unfortunates are there who, once in, are only sunk deeper by their efforts to extricate themselvs without the aid of friendly hands whose owners are on the firm rock of success and wisdom!

I had commenced the study of several books, and, not being able to comprehend all that was in them, had plunged into this state of despair, in which I doubted whether life was worth the effort it takes to struggle through it. But now, thanks to the kindly hand that aided me, I hav crawled from the "slough," shaken the mud from me, and hav gone far enough away from it so I will never slip into its stagnant pools again.

In the evening after several hours' study in Compayré's "Lecture on Teaching," and as my eyes involuntarily closed over its thought-compelling pages, I decided to retire.

I immediately fell asleep, and no sooner was I asleep than I was transported to our orchard as mysteriously as Danhasch conveyed Badoura to Camaralzaman.

It was summer. I was seated beneath a faithful old cherry tree whose boughs were cracked and gnarled with age, yet they were covered with such clusters of green leaves and half-ripe fruit as to effectually shade me from Sol's hot rays. The birds were singing merrily in the trees.

I was speaking with an old man, white from head to foot, reminding me of the genie of Aladdin's lamp. The sun's heat seemed to make no impression on his venerable head.

Right here I wish to remark on this incongruity often found in dreams. It was summer when this sage was speaking to me about that which was more befitting the 31st of December.

Unfortunately I am unacquainted with the mysteries of short-hand writing; but as near as I can recollect, these were his words: "So thou hast made no resolutions for thy future conduct in life?

"My daughter, canst thou look me in the face? Canst thou look upon this storm-battered tree which in its death puts forth its greatest effort, and is not rebellious—canst thou look at nature, and not blush to own that thou hast said thou wouldst make no rules for thy bettering? But I would not chide thee. I wish that thou whom I advise wouldst think over what I say.

"Everything is advancing. Art thou content to stand still? Dost believe what thou hast read in thy favorit 'Henry Esmond,' that honor and fame count for nothing? (The old gentleman was well read.) Hast thou determined to abdicate thy right—nay, thy duty—of taking a part, even if small, in this world's struggle? Truly, then, thou foregoest thy heritage; for thy fathers and all that follow thee hav taken and will take their part in the world's strife. How canst thou tolerate the thought of giving up ambition?

"I mean not, my child, that thou, in fulfilling thy ambition, shouldst wrong others; thou hadst better die unknown. But do thy very best in life, so, when thou diest, thou shalt go satisfied that thou hast done thy part. Oh, my child (here he quoted a verse),

"How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
As if to breathe were life."

He spoke this so impressivly that it rings in my ears yet. His eyes were fastened upon the limbs of the old tree as if he recognized in it the symbol of himself. I wondered. Plucking up courage, I said: "Who—what art thou, my benefactor?"

Looking me steadfastly in the eyes, he replied: "My child, I represent that spirit of ambition in the past generations whose luster was tarnished by an ignoble rusting; but after years of slothful action, the mortals came to realize that there is more in life than they had made of it. But the realization came too late, and their remaining years were remorseful." (This accounted for his melancholy appearance.)

He continued: "Daughter, consider that thou livest but once; that all are in the world having an influence, either good or bad; thou canst liv so thou wilt be remembered—so that posterity will know thou hast not lived in vain. I know this is a selfish world, but make the best thou canst of it."

"Oh, father, forgiv me for my rash mistrust of the gift of life," cried I. "Nay, child; show thy repentance by living a life of usefulness if not of note."

I fell upon my knees and was in the act of devoutly kissing his hand, when his white figure vanished, gazing reproachfully at me.

All was still. The birds ceased singing. A cloud passed over the sun, and its shadow flew over the orchard and over the rolling meadow beyond. I heard a gentle whisper as if the unseen spirit still hovered near:

Wouldst fashion for thyself a seemly life?
Then fret not over what is past and gone;
And spite of all thou mayst hav lost behind,
Yet act as if thy life were just begun.

I awoke at this point to find myself staring at the white window curtains, while the wind was sighing and moaning in the pine trees outside.

I think my dream, unlike Nebuchadnezzar's, does not need an interpreter. What do you think, friends?

Versailles, Ind. EMMA STOCKINGER.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

It was little Dot's first visit to a farm, and she went with her aunt to see how the pigs were fed. The little one gazed in astonishment at the young porkers for a moment, and then, placing her hand on her curly hair, she said reflectivly: "Auntie?" "Yes, dear." "Does 'oo put all the piggies' tails in curl papers?"

A little girl, who made too much noise in her sick mother's room, was put out into the hall, and soon after a miserable old rag doll, of which she was very fond, was tossed out to her. This was the "straw" that did it. Snatching up her beloved, and hugging it tightly in her arms, with streaming eyes, she sobbed out to her grandma: "I would'nt 'a' tared, but what has Judy done?"

There was company for dinner at Dilly's house, and they were enjoying the first course, which consisted of oyster soup. Dilly made away with hers some time in silence until she had nearly cleaned the plate, when she suddenly paused, and, looking at her mother across the table, said in a stage whisper, "Mamma, what you fink? Dere's hair in the soup!" "Hush, Dilly," said mamma, frowning; "it's nothing but a crack in the plate." Dilly moved the bowl of her spoon back and forth over the supposed crack, and then exclaimed triumphantly: "Kin a crack move?"

Correspondence.

CROMWELL, IA., Jan. 4, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I visited the Corner, but in this time there has been but little change in my life and surroundings. I believe the last time I wrote was some three years ago, and during that time I hav had the pleasure of hearing but two lectures, both given this fall.

The first was by J. E. Remsburg, who lectured at Creston on September 8th. We liv six miles from there, but a distance of sixteen miles could not hav kept us from going.

Once there, we enjoyed one of the best of lectures, filled with the most witty sayings. I think it was almost too rich for the blood of some, for a few got up and left the room about as fast as feet could carry them. I think one or two of them must hav knocked out about all the sense they had in trying to get out of the door in such a hurry. But the majority were greatly pleased, and many of them came the next month and listened to a lecture by W. S. Bell. At this time the roads were very bad, and it was quite cold; but what did we care for that, with the prospect of seeing Mr. Bell once more? Some five years ago he was at our home for four days. I can well remember how he held my little sister, now eight years old, on one knee, and I sat on the other, while he told us stories innumerable. Anyone who knows him can well imagin how he entertained us those four days, and our delight upon seeing him again, well and hearty. I think I never enjoyed a lecture as much as I did his.

Here we seldom see a Liberal. I hav a Liberal friend living fourteen miles from here. But she is attending the Highland Park Normal School, at Des Moines, at present, so you see I am utterly alone.

I get very lonesome sometimes, and for consolation I read, paint, or play on the violin or organ. I am very fond of reading, and read almost any kind of literature, from a dime novel to the Bible and Bell's "Handbook of Freethought." I like fiction as well as good common-sense reading, and would like to exchange THE TRUTH SEEKER or Boston Investigator with some one for a good weekly story paper.

FARIB ULT, MINN., Jan. 3, 1892.

MR. GEO. J. REMSBURG, Oak Mills, Kan., My Dear Sir and Brother in Truth: Your postal of the 16th ult. at hand, it having followed me in my travels, hence the delay in replying.

I highly appreciate correspondence of brothers in the cause of mental liberty, and if I can prove myself competent to correspond with you, I assure you I will be glad to be your humble servant. I hav noticed several of your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER and they all hav the right ring to them. I am glad to see young talents arrayed on our side, as it is certainly through them we may hope to redeem the world from the blighting influence of superstition.

Some time ago I noticed a slight mention in THE TRUTH SEEKER of a children's paper being started. Now, this is the right move, and I think I remarked in a letter to Miss Wixon the pressing need of such a paper, and I think I said, also, that with such help as yourself and many others of our bright young Liberals, it could be made a literary success, and I believe that the Liberals would be glad to make it a financial one. When we hav such help as our intelligent Miss Wixon it seems to me that we are standing in our own light if we do not come forward with our cooperativ attention and establish a nice little journal if only issued monthly for a time until it could be made a weekly.

It seems to me suggestiv to good results to hav the paper similar to the Youth's Companion, with some fine pictorial work on the first page, as it would attract the attention of our young readers, like ourselvs with THE TRUTH SEEKER, anxious to see what the next issue will bring from the brush of the artist. My friend George, I am sure there is no question that a good paper for children will do more to help us along than all the work that can be done among the older people who hav their superstition ground into them so deep that it would spoil the fabric in dusting them out. I presume your father is hard at work as usual casting pearls before the swine. I wish we had more like hm, Ingersoll, Jamieson, Putnam, Reynolds. and others.

Giv my regards to your father and tell him I hav not forgotten the pleasant visit I enjoyed with him, and that he may liv long enough to see orthodoxy kindly buried and the standard of desire for truth and mental liberty in its stead.

With best wishes for you and yours I beg to be fraternally yours,

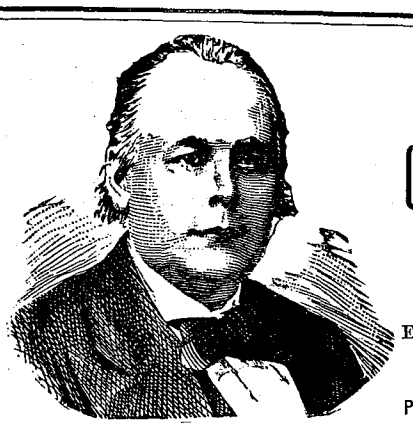
IN the case of Clarence Lay, the Burlington, Ia., boy who died under Christian Science treatment, the coroner's jury find gross neglect and censure the parents, ordering prosecution of Mrs. Vandewater, the Christian Scientist who treated the boy.

PRESIDENT DIAZ of Mexico, who believes in separation of church and state and has always disfavored the priests, is now imprisoning large numbers of them who are conspiring against the state. The ignorant class hate him, and revolution may result.

THE Berlin Kreuz Zeitung thinks a mistake was made in releasing the Jewish butcher at Xanter accused of murdering a Christian boy to use his blood in religious rites. It says that the belief that Jews do such things is not a superstition but a truth.



A REPORT from Veronzh, Russia, says that in that province the death-rate has doubled. Marriages hav ceased. The gentry fear a peasants' revolt in the spring. There is a great demand for fire-arms by all classes. "The peasants show an entire lack of self-help; they rely entirely upon the czar."

THE suppression of Methodism in Vienna, though done ostensibly at the instance of the Catholic church, was really brought about by the Lutheran church, which has harassed the Methodist church out of jealousy ever since the wealthy Baroness Von Langenau left the Lutheran church for the Methodist.

THE latest new religion is being preached at Princeton, Ky., by Mr. Terry. He has made a calculation from the Bible that Christ came to the earth in 1784 and is still here, and that the world will end in Octobre, 1914. He says that people hav been living in the dark ages and the truth has been revealed only by him.

CONGRESS daily expects a message from the president calling for war with Chili. That nation has given new offense by finding fault with a United States captain for firing a salute to the Spanish minister there. The minister was a Balmacedist, and is a refugee. Chili offends also by denying the right of our legation and ships to shelter refugees.

THERE is still trouble between the French government and the Catholic church, arising from disobeyal of the government's order to bishops to organize no more pilgrimages to Rome. The Freethinking Roman populace assault the pilgrims, and this leads to trouble between the governments of France and Italy, which the former wishes to avoid.

A Physician's Sermon to Young Men. By Dr. W. Pratt. Price, 25 cents. Prof. R. A. Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Gems of Thought.

IT is never too late to giv up our prejudices.—Thoreau.

IN olden times, when the heavens were visited by comets, war, pestilence, and famin were predicted. If wars came, the prediction was remembered; if nothing happened, it was forgotten. When eclipses visited the sun and moon, the barbarian fell upon his knees, and accounted for the phenomenon by the wickedness of his neighbor.—Ingersoll.

So shall they build me altars in their zeal,
Where knaves shall minister, and fools shall kneel;
Where faith may mutter o'er her mystic spell,
Written in blood—and bigotry may swell
The sail he spreads for heaven with blasts from hell.
—The Veiled Prophet in Moore's Lalla Rookh.

IT often happened, that the specific gravity of epileptics, whose fibers and muscles withered away, was lighter than water, and that they floated when put into it. A miracle! was instantly exclaimed. It was pronounced that such a person must be a demoniac or a sorcerer; and holy water or the executioner was immediately sent for. It was an unquestionable proof that either the demon had become master of the body of the floating person, or that the latter had voluntarily delivered himself over to the demon. On the first supposition the person was exorcised, on the second he was burnt. Thus hav we been reasoning and acting for a period of fifteen or sixteen hundred years, and yet we hav the effrontery to laugh at the Caffres!—Voltaire.

THE phrases "mortal body" and "immortal spirit," which hav been repeated ad nauseam, are misnomers altogether. Exact thought might possibly reverse the adjectivs. The body in its individual form or shape is indeed mortal, but it is not so in its constituent particles. Not in death only but throughout life it changes unceasingly, as we hav seen; but in the wider sense it is immortal, since not the smallest particle of it can be annihilated. On the other hand we see that what we call spirit, soul, consciousness, disappears with the individual combination of matter; and it must appear to the unprejudiced mind that this action, having been brought about by peculiar and very complicated unions, must come to an end with its cause, that is to say, with the cessation of those peculiar combinations. To-day the indestructibility or permanence of matter is a scientific fact firmly established and no longer to be denied. It is interesting to observe that former philosophers and thinkers also possessed a knowledge of this important truth, although in an incomplete form and rather as a presentiment than as a scientifically known and established certainty. The experimental proof thereof could only be yielded by our balances and retorts.—Büchner.

O LORD, . . . when Christ died, some eighteen centuries ago, did somebody come and bury you? He affirmed, "I and my father are one;" and yet he got so muddled as ultimately to cry to himself to save himself. The Ghost does not appear to hav been so vexatiously like either of you. He seems to hav descended from heaven in the shape of a pigeon. This is, no doubt, an exceedingly convenient form, and would, most likely, quite obviate his mistaking himself for either the father or the son. Still, this particular guise is not without its dangers. Some day, before he can say "Knife!" he may find a quantity of slugs or sparrow-hail driven into his gizzard by some unconsciously profane sportsman, and next day he may find himself baked, along with a number of others, into a pigeon-pie, with his divine feet sticking up through the crust. One other of you, father or son, was once worse treated than this. The Romans nailed you up, as a farmer nails up a weasel to a barn-door; and, instead of finding yourself, heels uppermost, in a pigeon-pie, you found yourself in hell. Perhaps you will remember that, near a trifling town in an unimportant country, you had the misfortune to get executed. . . . Was it you or your son that was in hell, or were you both there, or was neither of you there? Or can you not, at this distance of time, make out which of you was there? If you were both in hell for three days, was there no God representing heaven and earth during that time except that poor pigeon? It is in vain I ask. Once, to a horde of ignorant Semites, you were garrulous; now, to the nations of educated Aryans, you are dumb. Once you walked in the garden in the cool of the day, and cried, "Adam, where art thou?" now, in the torrid heat of noon, I walk in the wilderness of the universe and cry, "God, where art thou?" But the sun blasts and the desert burns, and to my despairing cry there is only silence eternal.—Saladin in God and His Book.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

A Christian Corrects an Error About Infidels!

The churches of Rome and England hav frequently since the radical policy prevailed in Paris made the charge that the Infidels had not only made the public schools of Paris "Godless," but had gone to the extreme by using an Atheistic catechism as a text-book in them. The Catholic journals in this country hav been particularly assiduous in circulating this fable, and in England the bishop of Manchester made the charge publicly. That the allegation is untrue the bishop has since been compelled to acknowledge, which he did in a letter to the editor of the Manchester Courier, as follows:

"Sir: At the last meeting of the Diocesan Conference in Manchester I reported, on the authority of Archdeacon Emery, that certain questions and answers of an anti-religious character taken from the 'Manuel de l'Instruction Laique, par Edgard Monteil,' formed part of the course of instruction for children in the public schools of Paris. The correctness of this report was challenged, and with the help of Mr. Lomax and others I hav made as thorough an inquiry into the matter as I could. I find that the report is based on nothing more definit than on the use of the manual in certain schools of Paris which are not public schools, and on an attempt which was made, but was frustrated by the government, to introduce it into the libraries of the public schools.

"I am convinced that the manual was never admitted as a book of instruction into the public schools of Paris. I am assured of this by witnesses whose knowledge and good faith are above suspicion, and by an examination of the authorized syllabus and official instructions by which the work of the public schools of Paris is directed.

"Under these circumstances, I hav to express my great regret that such a statement as that which I quoted should ever hav been made, and my greater regret that I should hav contributed to giv it a wider currency.

"Yours, etc., J. MANCHESTER.

"Bishop's Court, Manchester, Jan. 1, 1892."

Of course it would be as unfair to make the schools supported alike by Infidels and Christians Atheistic as to make them Theistic. Public schools should teach nothing whatever on the subject of religion. They should be maintained for the sole purpose of secular education, leaving the religious training of pupils to the parent.

We are glad that the bishop of Manchester has the honesty to acknowledge his error. It remains to be seen if the Catholics of this country will follow his good example.

Catholics Overriding the State.

A reader of the New York Sun asks of that paper this question:

"A couple (Catholics) were married by a justice of the peace; they kept house several years, and parted without a divorce. Both hav been married again to different parties (Catholics) by a priest, who held that the first marriage was not legal. Hav they not committed bigamy?"

The reply is given:

"Undoubtedly they hav. Marriage by a justice of the peace is perfectly legal in this state, and the officiating priest made a grave mistake in remarrying them, if your statement be correct. The church of Rome does not consider the first marriage as valid; but the law does, and the man and woman are liable for bigamy.

Cases like this are continually coming to light. Our civil laws are habitually transgressed by Roman Catholic priests, and by laymen under their direction. And whenever they wish but fear to break the law, they do not hesitate to denounce it and its enactors, and pray vehemently for the time when their church shall be able to scorn the statutes and crush their champions. Utterances of this sort are thick in every Catholic paper and book. Untouched by modern civilization—unconvinced by its arguments, unconverted by its proved merits, unconciliated by its fairness, unenlightened by its knowledge—the Roman Catholics continue in the fanatical devotion to ecclesiasticism that once well-nigh shipwrecked mankind, and they would gladly replunge the race in it at the first opportunity.

Mr. Buckley's Degradation of Himself.

The Rev. James M. Buckley, D.D., editor of the official organ of the Methodist church, has at last broken silence, so to speak, on the controversy in the Evening Telegram between Colonel Ingersoll and the ministers. Mr. Buckley, it will be remembered, started the controversy by advocating the boycotting of the Telegram for printing a "Christmas Sermon" by Colonel Ingersoll, and which Mr. Buckley politely denominated "lies that are mountainous."

In the Advocate of January 21st our doctor of divinity has nearly two pages of additional vituperation. He proposes, he says, no reply to Colonel Ingersoll, and he certainly sticks to his proposition. He maintains that the Telegram had no right to send Colonel Ingersoll's "blasphemies double-leaded, and surrounded with every artifice which the press can use to make the poison palatable, into homes where parents were teaching the children the Christmas carols, to declare to those children that their fathers were teaching them a base deception, and their mothers were instilling into them folly and falsehood, and that those parents are themselvs among the simpletons and feeble-minded of the world because they hav believed the teachings of their parents before them, that pure Christianity means 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will toward men,'" and he asserts that every copy of that issue of the Telegram was as a South American scorpion coiled in a basket of fruit, and he calls "upon Christian people to treat it as they would a butcher who would procure diseased meat and send it in with the family order."

Turning his illustrious attention from the publisher to the writer of the "Christmas Sermon" he defends the Methodist belief against the Calvinistic creed, claiming that Colonel Ingersoll confused them, and then catalogs some men more or less famous who believed in the justice of expelling from heaven and punishing those who persistently sin against all God's efforts and pleadings; which is as strong an argument, perhaps, as he can advance, but which no one knows better than he (for Dr. Buckley is no half-educated country parson) is not worth a straw in support of the theory that there is a God who punishes and rewards.

After this he leaves all pretension to argument aside and descends to personalities, discussing "The Man." He calls him coarse and blasphemous, unphilosophical, says he is the most vigorous opponent of the laws to prevent the circulation of obscene literature in the mails, quotes as making him the advocate of drinking the letter he wrote to a sick friend in sending him some whisky (which letter was, as probably intended, quite as cheering as the whisky), and says that among the long list of blasphemers Colonel Ingersoll shows the least delicacy, the least sense of responsibility, the most hardihood, and the most recklessness, takes the least pains to be accurate, makes the most unguarded and untrue statements, is most the slave of his words, most the creature of his moods, and thus he is, among the Infidels of modern times, the least difficult to meet, owing to his being ignorant of many things of such a discussion and the reckless inaccuracy of his assertions.

It was well for Mr. Buckley to say that he did not propose to answer Colonel Ingersoll. He has not; but he has answered anyone who hereafter shall say that J. M. Buckley is a decent and truthful man. He has revealed the weakness of his own character, the littleness of his disposition, the narrowness of his mind, and admitted the utter uselessness of trying to defend his religion. Controversially he has sunk to the lowest depths, and can take his place beside Clark Braden.

As a matter of fact, there is not in all Colonel Ingersoll's works a coarse word, nor an indelicacy of expression, nor a statement he cannot support. And as a further matter of fact, and of record, Colonel Ingersoll is not an opponent of the law to prevent obscene literature being mailed. We wish he were, for that law has been outrageously abused by unscrupulous men, and its repeal could not lead to one-tenth the damage to decency that its retention upon the statute book has done to endanger the liberty of the press. But Colonel Ingersoll never asked for its repeal. This slander is a favorit one with the clergy who lie for the glory of God, and has probably been a thousand times repeated.

Colonel Ingersoll once wrote to a friend that he had "no time to reply to the poor little reverend dogs who bark at him," but that his friend was authorized to state, and state publicly, that the Rev. C. O. Brown, of Dubuque, Iowa, who made the same charge now made by Dr. Buckley, was a liar. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 7, 1888, we went through the whole history of the attempt to modify or repeal the Comstock law, and Colonel Ingersoll's connection therewith. In that review we proved that Colonel Ingersoll never at any moment favored the repeal of the law, but only its modification, so as not to include Liberal literature which Comstock boasted he would, with its aid, soon "stamp out." Colonel Ingersoll never spoke against the law to any senate committee, or to anyone else; but he did leave the National Liberal League because that organization favored the repeal of the law. And at the congress of that body, before his withdrawal he said of these laws:

"They ought not to be repealed. Some of them are good. The law against sending instruments of vice in the mails is good, as is the law against sending obscene books and pictures, and the law against letting ignorant hyenas prey upon sick people, and the law which prevents the getters-up of bogus lotteries sending their letters through the mail."

If anything can settle the disputed question that ought to.

Now, let us see what relation the Rev. James M. Buckley, D.D., sustains to this law. We are not going to accuse him of advocating its repeal or modification, for he was never broad-minded enough for that; but if the New York Times has not misstated things, he ought to hav been arrested under it for advertising a book containing obscene pictures. In 1890 the Methodist Book Concern, the business organization publishing the Christian Advocate, sold a new book on Africa, about which country great public interest had been aroused by Henry M. Stanley. Of this book the Times said:

"It becomes almost an imperativ duty to say that this book by reason of its illustrations and some passages of its letter-press, is one that no man could put upon his bookshelvs or show in his family without shame. It seems to hav been the intent of the publishers of the volume to illustrate every phase of African nudity that has been made available either by the sketches of travelers or the creations of a filthy imagination. And yet, disgusting as is the edition sold by the Methodist Book Concern, there is an earlier edition containing sixteen coarse wood cuts of naked negro women that hav been omitted from the religious edition. For what purpose could these obscene images hav been so plentifully introduced in the book except to cater to prurient tastes and increase the sales? Does not all the world know that most African races reject the fig-leaf as burdensome? Would not one or two examples of Ethiopian fashions hav served all proper historical and anthropological purposes?"

In this matter, with these facts in view, Colonel Ingersoll can well afford to let the public judge between him and Mr. Buckley.

In this controversy on Christianity Dr. Buckley had the opportunity of his life to make name and fame as the defender of the faith which givs him his living. He has deliberately and cowardly shirked the issue and made name and *in*famy for himself by such mud-slinging and lying as would ill become the smallest-brained Methodist preacher ever imposed by a conference upon a backwoods congregation. He has shown his nature to be essentially small and mean.

The American Secular Union.

In response to our invitation the president of the American Secular Union this week outlines the future work of the organization.

We are gratified to note that the Union has adopted the suggestion made in these columns some months ago that the Union should arrange for an International Congress of Freethinkers during the World's Fair in 1893. But we also note, and with sadness, that it is proposed to do nothing else in the mean time but to arrange for that, except to hold a mass-meeting next month to protest against closing the Fair on Sundays. There is a good deal which can be done meantime, and one thing is especially urgent—opposition to Mr. Breckinridge's proposed Sunday law for the District of Columbia, which is national territory. That eminent Congressional pietist, at the behest of the American Sabbath Union, has again introduced his bill making it "unlawful for any person or corporation, or employee of any person or corporation in the District of Columbia, to perform any secular labor or business or to cause the same to be performed by any person in their employment on Sunday, except works of necessity or mercy, nor shall it be lawful for any person or corporation to receive pay for services performed or rendered in violation of this act."

The National Religious Liberty Association of Seventh Day Adventists will oppose this bill, and the Secularists ought not to lag behind the sectarians in the fight for separation of church and state.

The project for building a hundred-thousand-dollar building at Chicago is, we fear, impracticable; but it is practicable for the Union to find out why an officer of a religion draws a salary from the Fair funds.

The invitation to the speakers at the mass-meeting next month specifies as a danger threatening this country, "the aggregation of large amounts of capital into the hands of a few individuals, enabling them to control the industries of the country." That this may be a danger there is no doubt, but what has the Secular Union got to do with it? The Union has just issued a circular setting forth its principles as follows:

1. Taxation of church property.
2. No religious instruction and no Bible in the public schools.
3. No laws enforcing the observance of any Sabbath.
4. No appropriation of public funds for sectarian purposes.
5. No chaplains paid out of the public treasury.
6. No religious festivals or fasts by public authority.
7. A simple affirmation instead of oath in courts of justice.
8. Judicial protection of American citizens in their rights of conscience.
9. The principles of civil and religious liberty to be maintained, and all encroachments of the church upon the state to be resisted.

There is nothing in this about aggregations of capital, nor is it fitting that a meeting to protest against closing the World's Fair should be allowed to be diverted from its purpose to abuse millionaires, however much they may deserve it. The labor question has no business in that meeting.

It seems impossible to get officers for the Secular Union who will leave out of its propaganda their own peculiar fads and attend to the real work of the Union, which is opposition to the attempted legal encroachments of the church upon the liberties of the citizen, and the repeal of laws now existing by which church and state are practically united.

He Didn't See the Point.

A little while ago Colonel Ingersoll made a speech in Chicago. A Christian accused him in that speech of "ignoring the marriage rite and advising universal divorce." Thereupon THE TRUTH SEEKER quoted Colonel Ingersoll's exact words to show that the Christian lied, as almost all Christians do when speaking of Liberty's Champion.

In his speech Colonel Ingersoll said he regarded the family as the unit of government. Now Mr. B. R. Tucker is possessed of a burning desire to know if THE TRUTH SEEKER agrees with Colonel Ingersoll and he professes that he "shall be grateful to Colonel Ingersoll or to Mr. Macdonald if either of them will take a careful survey of contemporaneous nations" and tell "him the result of their observations" as to "whether every good government is made up of good families."

Mr. Tucker will please excuse Mr. Macdonald. What we intended to prove by quoting Colonel Ingersoll's actual words was that the Christian lied about him—not that the colonel was right in his opinion. And we proved it. But we cannot see the need of an essay describing the human unit of government, though if we should write one Mr. Tucker would probably agree with it.

For the benefit of an alleged army nurse in destitute circumstances in Cleveland, O., an alleged Professor Hackett, "an Infidel converted to Christianity," was to lecture on Infidelity, but failed owing to the non-appearance of the audience. For the benefit of those curious as to the "professor's" standing in heretical ranks we may say that he is not known at all as an Infidel among Infidels. And as the war department does not know Nurse Bradley, we fancy the church will make little capital from their efforts.

The letters to Congressmen are having some effect. W. E. Hooker, of Philadelphia, sends us papers containing the news that the letter signed by himself, Alice W. Denny, and others, has been brought to the attention of the House of Representativs and referred to a committee. This is as it should be. Let everyone in favor of having the World's Fair open on Sundays send a few stamps for these letters, get them signed, and mail them to his representativ in Congress.

Anthony Comstock will no doubt be pained to learn of the closing up, under the criminal laws of Missouri, of the Kansas City Sunday Sun. They were colaborers in the same vineyard. Both were consecrated to the work of suppressing "vice" and purifying morals. Both hypocritically sought the encouragement and protection of the church and clergy. Both grew fat upon the cash made in their work. Both succeeded in pulling the wool over the eyes of some really good people. Both stood in with "vice" when it suited them to do so. And the only thing we hav to complain of is that both were not wiped out of existence instead of one. Their claims upon Liberals for sympathy were equal. But Liberals do not believe in lawless liberty—the liberty of one man to violate the liberty and rights of others—but in a liberty which holds, or ought to hold, in check such invasiv scamps as Comstock and the proprietor of the Sun.

At the "convention of the apostolate of the press," held here last week, a point was made by politician David Healy on his Catholic brethren. One of the delegates thought it would be a good idea to "blarney" the politicians to work for such a scheme for restricting the liquor traffic as would not hurt either the politicians or the saloonkeepers. To prohibit people from drinking any but good whisky would be a step in the right direction, the delegate thought. "I am opposed to truckling to the politicians on the temperance question," replied Mr. Healy. "We could go a long way toward solving the problem if we could get the ten thousand Catholic liquor-dealers in New York out of that business and into some reputable trade. The delegates to this convention in their wanderings through the city must hav been struck by the great number of obviously Catholic names over corner ginmills. As a Catholic, I say I would be glad to see the number of Catholic saloonkeepers lessened and the number of Catholics in legitimate enterprises increased."

News and Notes.

Sunday, January 10th, was like a June day in New England. One might imagin it was opening summer as he sped along from San Francisco to San Jose. The hills are green, sunshine fills the sky, the hunters are out on every hand; but the game is scarce, for the birds fly high in the blue and soft empyrean.

The audience at San Jose is three times as large as on the Sunday before. If the weather holds good we may win against those thirty-two churches —some of which with their heavy and solemn walls remind us of the Dark Ages. The Romish element is prevailing here.

The Sunday evening meetings still increase at San Francisco. The hall was filled to overflowing Sunday night. I discussed Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Infidelity, while frankly criticising the positions of the first two and standing entirely upon the platform of the last. I concede the moral value of these beliefs—and essentially they represent something that is grand and beautiful. They are on the side of human progress. When it comes to a question of liberty, they are thoroughly opposed to orthodoxy. We may differ in ideas, but the supreme issue is not, simply what ideas are true, but the right to express what ideas we really think to be true. In the great battle that is coming the Spiritualist and Theosophist are our allies. They are antichurch. They believe in liberty, brotherhood, and advancement. I am a Materialist and an Atheist. I never expect to be anything else. I hav not the slightest faith in God or immortality; but I know that the great controversy of many years to come is not mainly as to the truth of my positions, but as to my right to hold them, true or not, without any interference of king or priest. In this mighty battle Spiritualism and Theosophy as movements are for the enfranchisement of the human being.

As Emerson says, let us first of all understand the points in which we agree, and then we can better understand and discuss our points of disagreement.

I shall giv this same lecture at Stockton February 7th. The Liberals are preparing for a grand Paine celebration at Stockton. N. F. Ravlin will giv the main address.

After the lecture Sunday evening the Freethought Society held a business meeting; committees were appointed to prepare for the Paine festival, to raise funds, secure music, speakers, etc. Great interest is manifested. The committee met on Tuesday evening. It was determined to hav ten-minute speeches from English, German, French, and Italian Liberals to make the celebration an international affair, for all can claim Thomas Paine as their representativ man. He was for the whole world.

We are not by any means in the swim; comparativly few are willing to work; but for all that we intend to make the Paine celebration in this city a brilliant affair.

I receive encouraging letters and support from all over the state in regard to the convention. Under the inspirations of the Paine festival we purpose this to be a working convention; to get ready for the fight. I expect a large attendance from outside the city.

On Thursday morning, with Mr. and Mrs. Emil Lemme, I went out to the Cliff House and Sutro hights. It was a gala day. The ride from the city to the seashore is most attractiv. We see the Golden Gate and the beautiful hills surrounding, and the ocean flashing far away in its glorious immensity. It was the day that the press delegation visited the place, and the elite of the journalism of the world was there to enjoy the wonderful panorama—a view of sea and shore and sky unsurpassed in magnificence. Mr. Sutro is building sea-baths on an extensiv scale, equal to the old Roman baths in convenience and splendor. My friend Lemme, an ardent Liberal, is the successful architect. He has won the prize against many competitors. He has only been established a year in his profession, and has already made a mark. The Liberals of Santa Clara hav made arrangements for lectures there.

After the convention I expect to make a lecture trip through southern California, Arizona, Texas, New Orleans, Mississippi, etc.

The Los Angeles Liberals are arranging for a Paine celebration. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

San Francisco, Jan. 16, 1892.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

Mr. Sluys, superintendent of the normal schools of Brussels, Belgium, is the most noteworthy of the many who, during the month of December, joined the Committee on Moral Laws, the president of which is Mons. Jean-Paul-Ce .

"It is safest to let the great Freethought child lie in peace," says Dagens Nyheter, the Stockholm daily paper, in speaking of a proposed attempt to prohibit Freethought Sunday-schools in Sweden. It is agreeable to read such items, for they prove that our cause has come to stay in Sweden.

Dr. Voelkel's Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt has at last got a successor. Mr. G. Tschian, Freereligious lecturer, Breslau, has begun the publication of a central organ for the Freereligious societies of Germany. It is called Freireligious Familienblatt, and appears twice a month. We hope soon to giv our readers news from the "Vaterland."

Those of our readers who are hero-worshipers, and especially such as hav a weakness for Napoleon I., will be pleased to hear that in Russia there are thousands of people who worship the French emperor as a god. The "Skopzi" (the name of the sect) believe Napoleon was Christ, who reappeared on earth to destroy the antichrist (the czar) and liberate the Russian peasants.

In "Holy" Russia there is a famin, and in the most Christian city of Vienna 12,000 schoolchildren are wondering how and when they will get their dinner. Last winter 12,300 gulden were subscribed, and 3,000 schoolchildren had a warm meal once a day at least. This year 4,800 children can be fed, but the rest? Well, they can comfort themselvs with the thought that the Lord will provide.

Fritänkaren continues to improve under the editorship of Viktor E. Lennstrand, who has, since the departure of our old friend, Captain Thomson, secured the assistance of Knut Wicksell, Ph. D., and Mrs. Anna B. Wicksell. We advise our Swedish friends each to subscribe for Fritänkaren for a year and hav it sent to one of their newly arrived countrymen who cannot read English.

Under the title of Moderne Götterdämmerung Mr. Wolfgang Schaumburg has introduced in an excellent translation Col. R. G. Ingersoll's well-known lecture, "Gods," to the German public. The book, which has sixty-seven pages, is issued by Schaumburg-Fleisher, Leipzig, is well printed, and we hope German Freethinkers will not be slow in presenting a copy of the same to a Christian friend.

While American Freethinkers, viz., the American Secular Union, do court, and hav for the last two years courted, the favor of the church people, and done nothing except issue a semi-orthodox manual, the Freethinkers of France hav made their Federation the strongest and most activ, and secured the respect of the clericals, and yet they hav societies bearing names like this, "Neither God nor Priests." Let us cease minding the feelings of church people; they do not regard our feelings.

In one of the last numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER we mentioned several rare relics which the Catholic church possesses. Since then we are informed that in the church of Doleran, Mecklenburg, Germany, which owns many holy relics, there is yet shown to visitors, among other rare things, a piece of Jacob's ladder, a piece of the Egyptian darkness (kept in a bottle), Delila's scissors with which she cut Samson's hair, and some bones of Adam's grandmother. The Milwaukee Freidenker is responsible for the above statement.

Arbejderen is the name of a lively Danish weekly journal published in the interest of reform, both social, political, religious, and moral. From an "ad" in the same paper we gather the information that there are given weekly (Sunday) lectures under the auspices of the Freethought Association of 1886. As a member of the general committee of the International Freethought Association we are particularly interested in Freethought movements, and hav written for information as to the Danish society. We are requested by the president of the International Association to urge the American Secular Union to join this society, but owing to the inanimation of the Union we hav not done so. Does the American Secular Union exist or is it a thing of the past?

The Australian Secular Association.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am instructed by the executiv council of the Australian Secular Association to ask you to be good enough to giv publicity to the following facts in your widely-circulated paper, as they may induce a prominent lecturer to visit this country. Our association was started in 1882. Its first president and lecturer was Mr. Thomas Walker, now member of Parliament in Sydney. In 1884 Mr. Joseph Symes, of England, was engaged, who continued lecturing for the association till June, 1888, when dissensions arose which brought about a serious disrupture in the association and ultimately led to a lawsuit in the supreme court, owing to the fact of Mr. Symes and some of his followers having jumped the association's land and erected a hall thereon. The trustees of the association got judgment against Symes in March last, which judgment was confirmed on appeal to the full court in October last. We are now carrying on our Sunday night meetings on free discussion lines, and the inclosed circular and rules will giv those interested in our movement an idea of the work the association is doing. Our hall is centrally situated, capable of holding twelv hundred people, and though we are only making a collection on Sundays at present we can legally charge for admission and intend doing so again if we can secure the services of a first-class lecturer. Our committee are opposed to paying any lecturer a fixed salary, but would treat with him as to giving him a percentage of the takings, being sure that such an arrangement would be more satisfactory to both parties. Dr. York, who visited this colony some years ago, would, I dare say, be in a position to giv anyone who is willing to come to these shores any further information.

Trusting that this letter may be the means of inducing some first-class lecturer to visit us, and thanking you in anticipation, I hav the honor to be

Yours fraternally, OTTO HORWITZ,
Sec. Australian Secular Association.

Fitzroy, Melbourne, Aus., Dec. 4, 1891.

The Australasian Secular Association holds its principal meetings on Sunday evenings at the Secular Hall, Victoria Parade, Fitzroy. The committee has since July a. c. made a new departure in the way of conducting their meetings by inviting prominent ladies and gentlemen to favor them with addresses, and so far with the greatest success. The time allotted for an address is from 7:45 till 8:15 or 8:30; then follows discussion, each speaker being allowed ten minutes till about 8:50, when the opener replies, he generally taking about fifteen or twenty minutes to do so.

No charge is made at the door, a collection only being taken up to defray expenses. The following is a list of the names of ladies and gentlemen who hav lectured at our hall, viz.: Mr. J. T. Kelly, "Why Do Men Starve?" Mr. B. O'Dowd, B.A., "Walt Whitman, the Poet of Democracy;" Mr. M. Miller, "Human Physiology;" Mr. Marshall Lyle, "The Judicial Murder of William Colstan;" Mr. C. Drake, "The God of the Bible;" Mr. W. D. Flinn, "Australia for the Australians;" the Rev. W. H. Fergurson (Chalmers church), "The Authenticity and Inspiration of the Bible;" Mr. T. T. Phillips, "The Romance of Jesus's Childhood;" Mr. M. Miller, "Scripture in Relation to Astronomy;" Mr. B. O'Dowd, "Dogma in Freethought;" Mr. Robert Jones (Carlton grammar school), "The Folly of Flesh Eating;" Mr. H. K. Rusden, "Deathbeds;" Fraulein Lepper, "How to Regain Health Without the Use of Drugs;" Mr. C. Drake, "Why I Am a Teetotaler;" Mr. A. Miller (Sydney), "The March of Progress and Whither Tending."

Prospectiv lectures: Dr. J. W. Barrett, "The Source of Human Energy;" James Stirling (government geologist), "Rambles of a Geologist."

The American Secular Union.

I hav been requested to say something about the future of our organization.

The permanent future of the American Secular Union depends much upon the degree of harmony which is to prevail among its members and supporters, and upon their willingness to work earnestly and vigorously together for the accomplishment of a common object.

Freethinkers and advanced Liberals—those who might be denominated "come-outers"—constitute the bone and sinew of the organization. To them we must look for success in the future. While we will gladly accept assistance from whatever quarter, it is not to be expected that a member of a religious organization will spend much time or money in aid of a society which is well known to consist in the main of those who look upon all the religions of the day as but so many forms of superstition.

We must carry the work forward by our own efforts, and with our own money.

The immediate future of the Secular Union relates to the World's Fair.

Our board of directors hav decided to call a congress of the friends of civil and religious freedom throughout the world, to meet in Chicago during the year 1893. The session should continue several days, or, which would perhaps be better, be held on a certain day in each week for several successiv weeks, so that as many can attend as possible.

At this congress the platform should be absolutely free.

By this I do not mean that discussion should be invited upon all subjects, but when any subject is up for discussion all should hav an opportunity to participate. No questions should be asked as to the speaker's views upon any other question than that before the house, and further he should hav the privilege of illustrating his arguments in any way he may choose.

For the abuse of the privilege he will of course be responsible to the audience. That is a matter that cannot be anticipated or provided for beforehand.

With a free platform, this Congress will stand out in bold relief, contrasted with the Religious Congress for the assembling of which preparations are being made. That congress is under the management of the World's Fair Auxiliary, so-called, which is acting with the sanction and under the auspices of the World's Fair directory. In the North American Review for October there is an elaborate statement by the World's Congress Auxiliary, from which it will be seen that in the religious branch of this congress "the discussions are to be limited strictly to an exposition of the points of contact or agreement between religions, while all discussions upon their differences are to be strictly eliminated." That "the Buddhist, the Mohammedan, the Brahmin, and the Confucian will all receive the most careful attention in their respectiv explanations of those points in which their religion and the Christian religion are in accord."

While the Buddhist, the Mohammedan, the Brahmin, and the Confucian is thus to be prohibited from discussing any point wherein his religion differs from the Christian religion, is it not manifest that Christian ministers will find it difficult to refrain from discussing any doctrin of their religion, whether it should agree with other religions or not?

Suppose they were to keep within the limits prescribed; what sort of a discussion is that which is confined to points on which the parties agree? It has been heretofore supposed that discussion necessarily involved points of difference. But now, in this model congress, there are to be discussions over points of agreement.

It has been reported in the public journals, and is generally understood to be the fact, that the president of the Congress Auxiliary is drawing a salary of $5,000 per annum from the board of directors of the World's Columbian Exposition. The act of Congress provided for "an exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mines, and sea." Those who contribute money, either as stockholders or otherwise, are supposed to hav in view the objects specified in the act of Congress. By what authority this money is appropriated for outside congresses, gotten up for the purpose of exhibiting, among other things, the points of agreement among religions, is yet to be determined.

While some are, as it is seen, precluded from saying anything against the Christian religion, others are precluded from saying anything at all. The Mormon, for instance, is expressly notified that he will not be afforded "an opportunity of presenting his religious views, as they are in direct antagonism to recognized moral and social laws."

There may be good reason for excluding the Mormon, since no Christian minister of whatever sect can hold his own in discussion with a Mormon. Polygamy is expressly sanctioned in the Bible. It is true it is condemned in the Book of Mormon, but the Mormon uses his own Bible to establish other doctrins, and when he comes to polygamy he falls back upon the Old Testament.

For the accommodation of this free Congress it will be necessary to hav a hall capable of accommodating a good-sized audience; at least a thousand; or better still, several thousand people. Such a hall should be under the entire control of those using it, and if possible should be owned by them. A movement for providing such a hall should be started at once. There is plenty of money among us. Can we not put up a building of our own? There is yet plenty of time for such a project. One hundred thousand dollars would suffice for such a building, four stories high, including cost of ground, though $200,000 would be better, and in either case, the structure, exclusiv of the hall, would pay five to six per cent net upon the investment. The hall should be free during the Fair year, and could, if thought desirable, be rented a portion of the time afterward. Are there not a hundred persons in the United States who would invest from one to two thousand dollars each in this manner? In such a project Freethinkers and Spiritualists might unite, and perhaps also the trade and labor assembly.

We would be glad to hear from the friends of civil and religious liberty upon this subject. If anything is to be done it should be done soon, so that work can be commenced next spring, giving a year for the erection and completion of the building.

The first movement of the American Secular Union for the current year is to be a mass meeting, to be held under its auspices at Central Music Hall, in this city, on Saturday evening, the 27th of February next, to protest against closing the World's Fair on Sunday. The Secular Union takes the management of the meeting, but other societies will assist, particularly societies among the working classes. These are beginning to see that they hav much in common with us; especially are they opposed to Sunday laws and other religious legislation.

A letter lately received from a prominent leader in the labor movement, who had been invited by our board of directors to address the February meeting, givs evidence of the prevailing sentiment. He says:

> The dangers you cite, as threatening this country [these had been specified as twofold, to wit: the aggregation of large amounts of capital into the hands of a few individuals, enabling them to control the industries of the country; and the movements tending to a union of church and state], are well defined, and fully recognized by myself, and, in my humble way, I am fighting the good fight against them, using as the most effectiv weapon such public agitation as tends to stimulate public thought; for with thought comes knowledge and with knowledge the unholy alliance of millionaires and ministers will come to naught.

We trust that all the friends throughout the country who can conveniently do so will attend this meeting. Free tickets for seats will be furnished to anyone applying by letter, but the seats will not be reserved later than till 8 o'clock.

Thus much of the purposes and projects of the American Secular Union. It will be seen that it is proposed to make the next two years, years of unusual activity. It is hoped that the result will be for the Union a successful and glorious future.

C. B. WAITE,
President American Secular Union.

Chicago, Jan. 18, 1892.

The Sabbath Union in Des Moines.

On Wednesday and Thursday, December 16th and 17th, the American Sabbath Union held its third annual convention in Des Moines. We did not attend it, but we read a report of its proceedings in the Des Moines Leader, which we accept as authority in all our statements concerning the actions of the Union.

As this was a national convention, delegates were present from nearly every state in which the Sabbatarians are organized. Elliott F. Shepard, who prints a scripture text at the top of his editorial column every day, was on hand. He is a Torquemada and Simon de Montfort combined. He would enforce to the letter the command given in Deut. xiii, 7, 10, and if he had the power would hav every Atheist banished or imprisoned. There was Herrick Johnson, D.D., of Chicago, who, like J. M. Buckley, has written a book assailing the stage and the actors, vilifying a profession tenfold more honorable than his own, and the members of which are equally as moral. Then followed a long array of reverend D.D.'s. Besides these there were some ladies, possibly from the Women's Christian Temperance Union. This high and mighty body met in the Presbyterian church, where for two days they raved at the terrible wickedness which is secularizing the Sabbath, keeping the people away from church and the quarters out of the contribution-box, and warning the priest that he will soon find his occupation gone. Rev. Dr. Knowles said: "The secular newspaper, the tendency toward Sunday amusements, the opening of museums, etc., are some of the evil agents we must combat." Rev. Dr. Thompson, of San Francisco, drew a discouraging picture of the Sabbath in the West, and its almost total lack of observances. Rev. T. J. Lamb, of Madison, Wis., said, "Year after year, the breakers of the Sabbath are becoming more numerous and bolder."

The evils of allowing the Columbian Exposition to be open on the "Sabbath" were glowingly depicted by Dr. Johnson. He said: "It is against the consciences of ten million citizen church-members to open those gates on Sunday. It would be a fearful menace to social order, for with Sunday morning one hundred thousand Sabbath-breakers would be dumped into the streets of Chicago. Sunday would become the devil's harvest, and parts of Chicago would become a veritable pandemonium." We giv these quotations to illustrate the tone and temper of the assembly before we notice its other features.

Heretofore, the Sabbatarians tried to hide the cloven foot of the devil of Ecclesiasticism that they are trying to engraft into our government by asserting that the Sunday law that they are laboring for is not based upon religious grounds, but that it is a civil measure, made especially for the benefit of the workingman. They tried this in Des Moines, but the attempt was a complete failure. The mask of hypocrisy has been used so much that it is almost worn through, and all intelligent persons can see the hideousness of priestcraft behind it. So plain did this appear in their recent convention, that one of their number arose and admitted that the term "civil Sabbath" was deceptiv, which is equal to saying that the Sabbath Union has been willfully misrepresenting its real object for the past four years. When Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts was in Des Moines over a year ago, he positivly denied that the organization of which he was secretary had any intention of forcing religion upon the people, just as Rev. Mr. Frisbie did at the Des Moines convention, and declared that it was not in any way connected with the movement. To hear him talk you would think that, like Dr. Westbrook, he believed in a Sunday law justified by "physiological and other secular reasons." Yet, this same W. F. Crafts, in an address before the Knights of Labor in Chicago, Sept. 21, 1888, said these words: "A weekly day of rest has never been permanently secured in any land, except upon the basis of religious obligation. Take the religion out, and you take the rest out."

We will giv another fact as evidence of their duplicity. When the first Sunday bill was introduced into Congress by Senator Blair, the real object of the movement was not concealed—i. e., to force people into the church by closing all other places of amusement, recreation, and instruction. The bill was headed, "A bill to secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, as a day of rest, and to promote its observance as a day of religious worship." But the ecclesiastical viper had not yet completely coiled himself around our national legislature. The spirit of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, and Thomas Paine still animated the minds of some of our statesmen, declaring, with the experience of fifteen hundred years behind them, the untold evils that union of church and state invariably bring. So this bill was defeated. The Sabbatarians did not despair, but brought forth another one, the substance of which was the same, but the title different—just enough to make it deceptiv. It read, "A bill to secure to the people the privileges of rest and religious worship, free from the disturbance of others, on the first day of the week." Read the first bill and then the second, and you will find that their provisions are the same in every particular, and the title of the first one expresses the object of the enactment of both.

We now come to the question of the relation of the workingmen to Sunday laws. Oh, how pathetic Sabbath Union orators become when describing the tortures of laboring men, railroad employees, and post-office clerks, groaning and sweating under Sunday work! Like Niobe, they are all tears. To hear them you would think that the great labor question that is now agitating the minds of the best thinkers of the age is wholly involved in the Sunday question, and that when it is settled there will be no more labor troubles. They also try to make us believe that laboring men themselvs are so anxious to hav a puritanical Sunday law put into force. They tried this plan in Des Moines, but, like the "civil Sabbath," it fell flat. With the fact that the Knights of Labor, almost to a man, resolved to hav the World's Fair open on Sunday staring them in the face, they were stupefied to know what to do. Then came the humiliating proceeding.

> But yesterday the word of Cæsar might
> Hav stood against the world; now lies he there,
> And none so poor to do him reverence;

for here they were, down on their knees to the laboring men, asking their coöperation in the work of closing the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. They sent a telegram away down to Birmingham, Ala., requesting the Confederation of Labor convention there in session to aid them in their schemes. Had their former assertions been true, we would hav seen the labor organizations sending delegates to the Sabbath Union conventions. Instead of the Sabbath Union sending telegrams to labor organizations, we would see telegrams coming from the latter to the former, bidding them God-speed in the good work. Still hope remained for the third annual convention of the American Sabbath Union. They fished about and brought to the floor a so-called laboring man—one who does most of his laboring with his tongue—who said that he was in favor of closing the Exposition on Sunday. This cannot other than cause a smile to come upon the face of everyone who knows the true character of this "laboring man." They know that he is a man who will speak upon any side of a question that will bring himself into prominence, and will go to any meeting where he is allowed to spout. Another fact that the attention of the Sabbath Union people should be directed to: Some eight months over a year ago this same man, in connection with others of his kind, undertook to organize a laboring man's party, to take part in a pending city election, when, to their surprise, the officers of the Des Moines labor organizations came out under their own signatures and said that these persons were not looked upon by Des Moines laboring men as representativs of their organizations, denouncing them, in substance, as demagogs, and warning genuin laboring men not to be deceived by them; and we think that he was as much the representativ of genuin laboring men in the Sabbath Union convention as he was when he aspired to political distinction. But to do justice, both to the man himself and to the Union, we will say that he was only present as a visitor and not as a delegate; but he was utilized by the convention to make the people believe that laboring men were in sympathy with its work. We will giv another instance, similar in some respects to this one, to show how false is the cry that is continually made by Sunday law advocates, which we read in the American Sentinel. In Washington, D. C., Feb. 18, 1890, Wilbur F. Crafts brought before the committee on the District of Columbia a Mr. Schulteis, who claimed to represent Local Assembly No. 2,672, K. of L., and that that assembly had indorsed the Breckinridge Sunday Bill. Unfortunately, however, Mr. M. F. Hobbes, master workman of the whole federation of Knights of Labor in the District of Columbia, was present, and hit the lie on the head. He said:

"No one has been authorized by the Knights of Labor to speak in favor of this bill. Mr. Schulteis is not authorized to speak for the Knights of Labor. It is true, Mr. Schulteis is a member of a committee having charge of certain matters, but that committee has nothing to do with this question. The Knights of Labor are virtually opposed to this bill. Some are in favor of some parts of it; some are in favor of all of it; and some are entirely opposed to all of it. For this reason the Knights of Labor of the District, as an organization, hav refused to hav anything to do with it.

"We are all in favor of a day of rest, some of two days; but we are afraid of the religious side of this question. What benefits the Knights of Labor wish to obtain we think can be better secured by our own efforts, through our own organizations, than by the efforts of others through the church."

One who was present and heard Mr. Hobbes speak thus describes the effect of his utterances:

"This speech, coming as it did, was more or less of a surprise to all; but to Mr. Crafts and his party it was 'a stunner.' It instantly crushed to atoms the whole pet theory which they had so nicely framed and so pathetically presented in behalf of 'the poor workingmen who are so cruelly oppressed by being forced to labor on Sunday,' and of the church's gallant effort to liberate them from 'the Egyptian bondage of Sunday slavery.' Nothing could hav happened that would more clearly expose the perfect hollowness of the plea that is made by the American Sabbath Union that this movement is in the interests of the workingman than did this unpremeditated and wholly unsolicited speech."

Where did this "Sabbath" movement start? Did it start in labor organizations. No! It began in the church—hatched by priestcraft in the nest of superstition. Who started it—laboring men? No, preachers; who know that they cannot do any business on Sunday unless they hav a monopoly of that day. Do labor organizations and labor journals agitate the question? No! Who does? Preachers, churches, and religious journals. We believe that the American workingman is intelligent enough to know his own rights and powerful enough to demand them, and when he has to call upon the men with black coats and white chokers to look after his interests, those gentlemen will be duly informed of it.

The prospect of the World's Fair being open on Sunday seems to worry our Christian friends exceedingly. If so, there would be no end to the evil that would result. But experience has shown that whenever museums, libraries, and other reputable places of public resort hav been thrown open to the people on Sunday good has resulted from it. On the other hand, where strict Sunday laws hav been enforced, and the people had thereby no reputable recreation, they invariably rushed into disreputable ones. After years of agitation the Metropolitan Museum of New York city was opened to the public on Sunday. Were the results demoralizing? Let a Christian journal speak:

> The experiment of opening the Metropolitan Museum on Sunday has now been tried over four months, and the success has been so great that all opposition has been done away with, and the trustees who at first objected hav yielded frankly and fully, deciding to make the Sunday opening a permanent thing if the necessary money can be raised. In the first eighteen Sundays over a hundred thousand people came. Some damage was done, but not much. To the majority of the great crowds who went in it was a new experience, and a few did not know how to behave themselvs, or to appreciate the opportunity. But they will learn this, together with much other valuable knowledge, and the public and the press will never hav to regret their efforts to force open those tightly-closed doors.—Christian Union, October 31st.

W. C. Gannett, in his essay on "The Workingman's Sunday," says:

> There is the public library reading-room. In Boston, it took ten separate struggles, during a seventeen years' campaign, beginning with a hardly-listened-to proposal in 1856 and embracing long discussions in the city councils and the papers, repeated hearings of petitioners and remonstrants, two mayors' vetoes, and two appeals to the legislature, to open the doors to him (the workingman). Feb. 9, 1873, saw him at last allowed to enter. He has scanty time for papers or magazines through the week, and there he finds a feast of them. If you go there you will see him any Sunday afternoon or evening. According to the last report of the Boston Library, at its central reading-room it takes on the average that day four hundred and seventy-six periodicals to feed him and his fellows—the winter average apart from the summer much exceeding this—and on full Sundays the congregation overflows into the next room. A very considerable portion are persons who do not or can not visit the library on week-days—reporters, mechanics, and those who work early and late. The Milwaukee Library ventured to do the same in 1869 or 1870. In Philadelphia, the Mercantile Library also followed suit in 1870. Before the second year was out the attendance averaged seven hundred, "nearly all young men," and it reports gradually increasing numbers ever since. The Cincinnati Public Library opening its doors on a March Sunday of 1871, has the past year averaged over eleven hundred in its Sunday reading-rooms. . . . In Philadelphia the new Academy of Arts is open on that day at the week-day price; the attendance is larger than on week-days and of about the same character; many in humble life who could not come through the week enjoying the exhibition to their heart's content—some even carrying babies rather than not come. The Zoological Gardens there are also open and at the usual price the attendance on Sundays is at least three times greater than on week-days; the class of visitors averages about the same, and it is always orderly. Abroad, the thing is past experiment. In the German city Sunday is the people's free day at the galleries. In Berlin, it is Monday that sees them closed and their custodians resting. In Paris, it is said that the book most applied for at the leading libraries on Saturdays is the guide-book to the museum for the next day's treat. The next day the Louvre opens its apartments exceptionally wide. Going there you find the rooms possessed by workingmen and peasants, whole families down to the awed children, each one dressed and mannered at his best, enjoying it together. In English Birmingham they dared the experiment three or four years ago with good success. In Dublin, both the Botanical and Zoological Gardens are opened on Sunday and hav three times as many visitors as on all the other six days together.

We would like for the croakers of evil to refute these facts, or forever hold their peace about the Sunday opening of museums, fairs, etc., having a demoralizing influence. But some say that the Sunday opening of the Columbian Exposition will deprive the Fair employees and the railroad men of the privilege of rest. This argument is on a par with others advanced by the same persons. It is well known that there are thousands of men all over the country out of work, and when the public convenience demands it, both the Fair commission and the railroad companies can employ extra help. A very good suggestion to close the Fair on Monday for the workmen to rest has been made, and, if carried out, would work well with the public at large.

No class of men will be injured by it except the ministers. If they are unable to endure competition, they hav no right to exist. Secularists do not wish to abolish Sunday as a day of cessation from labor. On the contrary, they would divest it of the theological gloom that overshadows it. They would open every avenue by which amusement, instruction, and recreation could be brought about on that day. They would make those fifty-two days of the year the brightest and happiest of all. What they do claim is, that personal liberty should not be curtailed on Sunday any more than on any other day; that we should exercise all the freedom we want providing we do not interfere with the rights of our neighbor, and with that great principle of our government so little observed at the present day, "the greatest good to the greatest number." On the other hand, what would the clergy do? They would shut up all means of elevating the people. Theaters, libraries, lecture rooms, concert halls, and museums would all be closed. The masses would then either hav to go to church, or seek some debasing amusement. In fact, everything must cease, so that these men can hav all the time to instill their poisonous superstition into the minds of the people, just as in the olden time the sun and moon are said to hav stopped so as to enable Joshua to murder more of his fellow-creatures.

Question: What place does the theater hold among the arts?

Answer: Nearly all the arts unite in the theater, and it is the result of the best, the highest, the most artistic, that man can do.

In the first place, there must be the dramatic poet. Dramatic poetry is the subtlest, profoundest, the most intellectual, the most passionate and artistic of all.

Then the stage must be prepared, and there is work for the architect, the painter, and sculptor.

Then the actors appear, and they must be gifted with imagination, with a high order of intelligence; they must hav sympathies quick and deep, natures capable of the greatest emotion, dominated by passion. They must hav impressiv presence, and all that is manly should meet and unite in the actor; all that is womanly, tender, intense, and admirable should be lavishly bestowed on the actress. In addition to all this, actors should hav the art of being natural.

Let me explain what I mean by being natural. When I say that an actor is natural, I mean that he appears to act in accordance with his ideal, in accordance with his nature, and that he is not an imitator or a copyist—that he is not made up of shreds and patches taken from others, but that all he does flows from interior fountains, and is consistent with his own nature, all having in a marked degree the highest characteristics of the man. That is what I mean by being natural.

The great actor must be acquainted with the heart, must know the motivs, ends, objects, and desires that control the thoughts and acts of men. He must be familiar with many people, including the lowest and the highest, so that he may giv to others, clothed with flesh and blood, the characters born of the poet's brain. The great actor must know the relations that exist between passion and voice, gesture and emphasis, expression and pose. He must speak not only with his voice, but with his body. The great actor must be master of many arts.

Then comes the musician. The theater has always been the home of music, and this music must be appropriate; must, or should, express or supplement what happens on the stage; should furnish rest and balm for minds overwrought with tragic deeds. To produce a great play, and put it worthily upon the stage, involves most arts, many sciences, and nearly all that is artistic, poetic, and dramatic in the mind of man.

Question: Should the drama teach lessons and discuss social problems, or should it giv simply intellectual pleasure and furnish amusement.

Answer: Every great play teaches many lessons and touches nearly all social problems. But the great play does this by indirection. Every beautiful thought is a teacher; every noble line speaks to the brain and heart. Beauty, proportion, melody suggest moral beauty, proportion in conduct and melody in life. In a great play the relations of the various characters, their objects, the means adopted for their accomplishment, must suggest, and in a certain sense solve or throw light on many social problems, so that the drama teaches lessons, discusses social problems and givs intellectual pleasure.

The stage should not be dogmatic; neither should its object be to directly enforce a moral. The great thing for the drama to do, and the great thing it has done, and is doing, is to cultivate the imagination. This is of the utmost importance. The civilization of man depends upon the development, not only of the intellect, but of the imagination. Most crimes of violence are committed by people who are destitute of imagination. People without imagination made most of the cruel and infamous creeds. They were the persecutors and destroyers of their fellow-men. By cultivating the imagination, the stage becomes one of the greatest teachers. It produces the climate in which the better feelings grow; it is the home of the ideal. All beautiful things tend to the civilization of man. The great statues plead for proportion in life, the great symphonies suggest the melody of conduct and the great plays cultivate the heart and brain.

Question: What do you think of the French drama as compared with the English, morally and artistically considered?

Answer: The modern French drama, so far as I am acquainted with it, is a disease. It deals with the abnormal. It is fashioned after Balzac. It exhibits moral tumors, mental cancers, and all kinds of abnormal fungi—excrescences. Everything is stood on its head; virtue livs in the brothel; the good are the really bad and the worst are, after all, the best. It portrays the exceptional, and mistakes the scum-covered bayou for the great river. The French dramatists seem to think that the ceremony of marriage sows the seeds of vice. They are always conveying the idea that the virtuous are uninteresting, rather stupid, without sense and spirit enough to take advantage of their privileges. Between the greatest French plays and the greatest English plays of course there is no comparison. If a Frenchman had written the plays of Shakspere Desdemona would hav been guilty, Isabella would hav ransomed her brother at the Duke's price, Juliet would hav married the Count Paris, run away from him, and joined Romeo in Mantua, and Miranda would hav listened coquettishly to the words of Caliban. The French are exceedingly artistic. They understand stage effects, love the climax, delight in surprises, especially in the improbable; but their dramatists lack sympathy and breadth of treatment. They are provincial. With them France is the world. They know little of other countries. Their plays do not touch the universal.

Question: What are your feelings in reference to idealism on the stage?

Answer: The stage ought to be the home of the ideal; in a word, the imagination should hav full sway. The great dramatist is a creator; he is the sovereign, and governs his own world. The realist is only a copyist. He does not need genius. All he wants is industry and the trick of imitation. On the stage, the real should be idealized, the ordinary should be transfigured; that is, the deeper meanings of things should be given. As we make music of common air and statues of stone, so the great dramatist should make life burst into blossom on the stage. A lot of words, facts, odds and ends, divided into acts and scenes do not make a play. These things are like old pieces of broken iron that need the heat of the furnace so that they may be molded into shape. Genius is that furnace, and in its heat and glow and flame these pieces, these fragments, become molten and are cast into noble and heroic forms. Realism degrades and impoverishes the stage.

Question: What attributes should an actor hav to be really great?

Answer: Intelligence, imagination, presence; a mobil and impressiv face; a body that lends itself to every mood in appropriate pose, one that is oak or willow, at will; self-possession; absolute ease; a voice capable of giving every shade of meaning and feeling, an intuitiv knowledge or perception of proportion, and above all the actor should be so sincere that he loses himself in the character he portrays. Such an actor will grow intellectually and morally. The great actor should strive to satisfy himself—to reach his own ideal.

Question: Do you enjoy Shakspere more in the library than Shakspere interpreted by actors now on the boards?

Answer: I enjoy Shakspere everywhere. I think it would giv me pleasure to hear those wonderful lines spoken even by phonographs. But Shakspere is greatest and best when grandly put upon the stage. There you know the connection, the relation, the circumstances, and these bring out the appropriateness and the perfect meaning of the text. Nobody in this country now thinks of Hamlet without thinking of Booth. For this generation, at least, Booth is Hamlet. It is impossible for me to read the words of Sir Toby without seeing the face of W. F. Owen. Brutus is Davenport, Cassius is Lawrence Barrett, and Lear will be associated always in my mind with Edwin Forrest. Lady Macbeth is to me Adelaide Ristori, the greatest actress I ever saw. If I understood music perfectly, I would much rather hear Seidl's orchestra play "Tristan" or Remenyi's matchless rendition of Schubert's "Ave Maria" than to read the notes.

Most people love the theater. Everything about it, from stage to gallery, attracts and fascinates. The mysterious realm, behind the scenes, from which emerge kings and clowns, villains and fools, heroes and lovers, and in which they disappear, is still a fairyland.

As long as man is man he will enjoy the love and laughter, the tears and rapture of the mimic world.

Question: Is it because we lack men of genius or because our life is too material that no truly great American plays hav been written?

Answer: No great play has been written since Shakspere; that is, no play has been written equal to any of his. But there is the same reason for that in all other countries, including England, that there is in this country, and that reason is that Shakspere has had no equal.

America has not failed because life in the republic is too material. Germany and France, and, in fact, all other nations, hav failed in the same way. In the sense in which I am speaking, Germany has produced no great play.

In the dramatic world Shakspere stands alone. Compared with him, even the classic is childish.

There is plenty of material in this country for plays. The republic has lived a great play—a great poem—a most marvelous drama. Here, on our soil, hav happened some of the greatest events in the history of the world. All human passions hav been and are in full play here, and here, as elsewhere, can be found the tragic, the comic, the beautiful, the poetic, the tears, the smiles, the lamentations, and the laughter that are the necessary warp and woof with which to weave the living tapestries that we call plays. We are beginning. We hav found that American plays must be American in spirit. We are tired of imitations and adaptations. We want plays worthy of the republic.

Some good work has recently been done, giving great hope for the future. Of course the realistic comes first; afterward the ideal. But here in America, as in all other lands, love is the eternal passion that will forever hold the stage. Around that everything else will move. It is the sun. All other passions are secondary. Their orbits are determined by the central force from which they receive their light and meaning. Love, however, must be kept pure. The great dramatist is, of necessity, a believer in virtue, in honesty, in courage, and in the nobility of human nature. He must know that there are men and women that even a God could not corrupt. Such knowledge, such feeling, is the foundation, and the only foundation that can support the splendid structure, the many-pillared stories and the swelling dome of the great drama.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Christmas eve! Well, a merry and happy Christmas to you all, though it will be a thing of the past when this reaches you; but the wish is a "now" thing, and is just as good as though you heard me say it. "A merry Christmas and a happy New Year:" that is our old English greeting which, I am quite sure, your American portions of the great English family will reciprocate most highly. I wish we knew more of each other. Americans are ogers till you get to know them. Englishmen like Americans about as much as Frenchmen like Germans, till they get acquainted with them; and then our lords and somebodies cannot rest till they hav installed in their castles and homesteads some beautiful flower from Jonathan's prairies. As in everything else, you hav the best to be had in Secularism. We hav no Ingersoll in England; but perhaps we hav a more fiercely burning desire to spread Secularism amongst the masses than you good folks possess. If Ingersoll is a grand preacher, G. W. Foote is a grand worker and an almost unrivaled speaker in the bargain.

Well, I am just leaving London for my new work in Lancashire. Manchester is to be the center of the new life. Liverpool is close at hand. That work of organizing which I tried upon a small scale in the north of Middlesex—that is to say, the northern suburbs of London, is to be continued on a larger scale in those counties where towns are as thick as villages in most parts of the world. And then in the course of two or three years, when this work shall hav been completed, I hope to be in a position to run across the Atlantic and visit your own Freethought societies and those of Australia, New Zealand, and India, so that I can be in touch with the actual workers in all the Anglicized parts of the world. How much I should value a brief letter with details, no matter how dry or unimportant they may seem to the writers, from every Secular society in the United States! I want to know exactly what is being done throughout the world, and to register the names of those who are faithful and true.

Letters addressed to me "Dalton Inn, Morton street, C.-on-M., Manchester, Eng.," would be like refreshing rain in the midst of a dry summer. Please favor me.

Our Baptist friends are feeling the advance of Liberal views in England. They are increasing, it is true, but not in proportion to the increase of population. Allowing for births and deaths they are not gaining ground; allowing for conversions they must be going downhill without let or hindrance. Their Handbook for 1892 shows that, in Great Britain and Ireland, the denomination has 3,798 chapels, with sitting accommodation for 1,225,097 persons. The number of churches is 2,812, with a membership of 334,163, an increase for the year of a miserable 4,000, more or less. I understand the difference here between a church and chapel to be that between an organization and a meeting-place. The usual term, "the church and congregation worshiping in Little Bethel," givs the clue. The "church" is the number of financial members; the "congregation" the unattached attendants, the chapel merely the fabric; if so, the Baptists could sell us a few spare concerns. The settled pastors number 1,841, or less than one for every two chapels, and local preachers 4,155. God's blessing on his dearly beloved Baptists is not so very thick after all is said and done. Our Methodist friends are getting quite excited over their decay. Mathematically speaking, they ought to show a large increase; practically speaking, they are being left beyond a doubt. A correspondent in one religious paper wants to know what there is for the two thousand Wesleyan ministers to show for their work and preaching; and he adds, pathetically, "instead of holy fire we hav the cold sweat of spiritual death." Why the stupid fellow does not try something else puzzles me. Secularism would find a rich, warm, glowing love of his fellows for him instead of the cold sweat business. We who hav been "religious" hav gone through the sweating process, and would not change our Secularism for it for all the crowns and golden harps or even spotless robes. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating." Let us who hav eaten and are satisfied find our way to these hungry Baptists and Methodists and show them this more excellent way.

The religious sensation of the hour is the "Higher Criticism of Holy Scripture." Everyone who is anyone in the ecclesiastical world is trying his hand at it. Canon Driver, in his "Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament," has stirred up the sticklers for direct inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The Church of England claims Canon Driver for its own; and the Congregationalists hav set up one of their professors who rejoices in the name of Cave. Principal Cave is the champion of the journal theory, which claims that the unity of the Books of the Law of Moses is due to their contemporaneousness with the events described; but the evolutionary theory advocated by Doctor Driver declares that much of the Pentateuch dates from a later period than the time of Moses. Perhaps one of them is right; I cannot say. The thought which naturally recurs again and again is, Where is God, the Holy Ghost, or whoever makes it his business to superintend the divine revelations? He may be everywhere, of course; but just as everybody's business is nobody's business, so to be everywhere may be to be nowhere, which is about the mark, don't you think so?

Friend Watts has reopened his Baskerville Hall, in Birmingham. When I called on him a few weeks ago he was good enough to show me over the building; but it was then in a miserable dirty condition. Now it has been rejuvenated to our colleague's great satisfaction. George Jacob Holyoake was too ill to attend the opening ceremonies. None the less they had a good show of sterling Freethought workers, and Brother Charles, with his happy family, are encouraged to fight with greater zeal than ever.

It would be unfair not to notice a most useful work which is being elaborately performed by Mr. John M. Robertson, the learned editor of the Na- tional Reformer. He has for several weeks past published in his paper a very lengthy list of books in the form of "Courses of Study;" some books, recommended to those whose leisure for study is scanty, having their titles printed in thick, black type, other titles being spaced out to indicate authoritativ or copious treatises. Robertson is a veritable bookworm, and I hav spent several extremely pleasant evenings with him in his sanctum sanctorum, where he seems to be perfectly at home with the contents of his considerable library.

Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

TAXATION.

"Taxation," says Turgot, "is the art of plucking the goose without making it cry." That is, to draw money from the people without their realizing the extent of the robbery, or even the manner in which they are robbed. They tax the goods in the hands of the merchant; the merchant has no objection. He adds it to the price of his goods, and it often enables him to monopolize certain branches of trade. The specialist wants a license—he gladly pays the tax—it makes his calling respectable by keeping out the very poor. The internal revenue is simply added to the value of the articles taxed. The landlord adds his tax to his rent. Hence all taxation in the end is paid by the consumer, and the consumer in the great majority is the laboring poor, for, if wealthy, he can shift his burden. The plucked geese may cry in the cold, but they know not their tormentors, and often resist the insinuation of friends that they are robbed. In connection with the cunning device of taxation is the equally cunning device of politics. The poor are really made to believe that they constitute the government and the taxes are really self-imposed. They hav been made to believe that the community as a whole has decided how much must be taken from each individual member to defray the necessary expenses of government and if any injustice be noticed they are told that it is simply impossible to be avoided. If any actual abuse occurs all they hav to do is to instruct their representativs or officials, and if it is not remedied they must elect new representativs. Hav they not the ballot? Are they not the majority?

> Who's to blame for what they do
> But the sovereign people?

It is the credulity of the masses who imagin that they create and recreate—that the welfare of the nation depends upon them—and they swell with the importance of the trust. See them as an election advances congregate together, discussing the importance of the occasion. And see the office-seeker approach.

> See how like a fawning publican he looks,
> See how he takes their hand as who should say:
> Your will and pleasure are my only governors.

Oh! what a most gigantic farce it is, and when the country settles down to enjoy a new administration they soon discover it to be a reiteration of the old. The average workingman will admit that it makes but little difference which party is elected to power. They are all swayed by one class. He will denounce them as robbers and liars. But with the approach of a new election he will again grasp his torch and regalia and swell with patriotic pride of party. Such is the hypnotic power of party. Will the workers ever break the spell? Government taxation is a trick for obtaining money to support an idle class. True, some things are done that may be an advantage to the people at large, but the real good derived from taxation is so small in comparison with the evil, that is, the supporting in luxury of the vast army of tax-eaters, whose only mission is to consume the hard-earned wages of the poor, that I feel justified in saying that it is absolutely a curse. Think of it, friends. There are many things we desire and we look to government to supply them. Yet we know that every movement of government costs many times more than individual effort. Just imagin if you can the absence of government, the non-existence of fat-salaried offices? Would nothing be done? Would civilization stand still? Would we all be murdered in our beds? I hardly think you will come to this conclusion when the novelty of this idea has become a little worn and you begin to study facts and their logical sequences. I know the innovation is a little startling and may appear to many grotesque or ludicrous. Proudhon tells of a Parisian in the seventeenth century who nearly died of laughter at the idea of a state in Venice being governed without a king, and the idea of society existing without an authoritativ government might be supposed to kill a man entirely but for the fact that the wondrous changes in society hav been preparing his mind, and the laugh of derision is being changed to serious contemplation, and what was deemed impossible is now being admitted as probable in the course of human events. Deep thinkers are admitting that the highest civilization will do away with political government, but they deem it necessary now. Hence they prefer to work on lines of reform and identify themselvs with some party. But what constitutes the necessity of government? I know you will answer, "The half-civilized condition of society," but I tell you it is simply the belief that it is necessary. Change this belief and government will follow older superstitions to limbo, and this change can only be effected by a direct advocacy.

It is folly to talk of any immediate change. All changes must follow the course of evolution. What I want you to realize is this, that any possible benefit to the human race is only kept from practical application by its limited advocates. I hav no patience with a man who talks of "the time not being ripe." It is not time that must ripen, but men, and he who refuses to advocate his highest truth will remain green to the end. I believe that government—that is to say, a sovereignty enforcing taxation—may and will be done away with. Reformers generally recognize the evils of taxation and other government methods, but hope by political readjustment to change those evils into benefits, false hopes that never hav and never can be realized, for the evil is in the sovereignty of the state, and the fact that human nature is about the same all round. Create authority and you institute slavery. You would never think of giving your neighbor authority over your person and property, although it might be shown that he was your superior in education, correct habits, and other propensities supposed to constitute the requirements of a gentleman and a scholar. And yet you will assist in voting such authority upon strangers and even upon those who are well known to be your inferiors in these requisits. I ask you to place this principle of evil where it belongs. It is not in taxation; it is not in governing. It is in the force of sovereign authority. Reformers not realizing the evil would employ this force in levying a tax on certain objectionable things in hopes to diminish their consumption, but as evil propagates evil we find the vice increasing by taxation. The prohibitionist would employ this force to do away with certain vices, but as evil produces evil his mission is a failure. The only party benefited by this force is the politician. He thrives upon evil as the lawyer thrives upon crime. Hence we find the two professions running cheek by jowl. The law having for its justification the prevention of crime in reality makes more crime than it prevents, and the law governing taxation is one of the most fruitful in this respect. The tariff creates the smuggler and requires a vast army of officials to watch him; it is a question if the custom house and its retinue could be supported by the revenue derived. But the indignities and abuse of those who travel and the degradation of those caught in evading this tax—which evasion everybody in his heart applauds—stamps the proceedings as iniquitous and outrageous. Think of it, friends, most of our crimes and criminals are made so by the law. It is a crime for our farmers to peddle their produce upon the streets of Buffalo unless they conform to certain regulations prescribed by certain officials. It is a crime for a poor man to play an organ upon the streets unless he pays a certain sum into the treasury of the city. "Taxation," says Mr. Ingalls, "has no justification in ethics or economics unless it is in equation with some service which the taxing power has rendered the individual taxed," and continuing admits that unless the equation is desired, there is no justification. No power should be enabled to force a man to pay for a benefit he did not desire. "This undertaking," wrote Emerson, "for another is the blunder which stands in colossal ugliness in the governments of the world. . . . A man who cannot be acquainted with me, taxes me; looking from afar at me, ordains that a part of my labor shall go to this or that whimsical end, not as I, but as he happens to fancy."

While the coining of money, the regulating of trade, and the protection supposed to be afforded the citizen are justly regarded as the most important of the functions of government, yet from the standpoint of government itself the most important—the really vital—function is the collection of taxation. Were I requested to state in the fewest possible words my conception of government, or its most distinguished feature, I should say compulsory taxation. This is the cornerstone, in fact, the whole foundation—the prop that doth sustain the house—the mainspring of the mechanism—and it is the same in all forms of government. Going back to its origin we may follow its evolution down to the latest and most democratic form; we shall find this principle controling its various organizations, and it matters not whether it be called tribute, tax or tariff, revenue or robbery, it is all one and the same thing, forcible taxation.

Emerson says, "Of all debts men are least willing to pay the taxes." The fact is, men do not regard them as debts or as an equivalent for value received, hence there exists an almost universal desire to evade their payment. Under freedom there could be no unjust taxation for the simple reason that men would flatly refuse to pay them. If men would realize the value of an equivalent and know that justice could only be established by the rendering of an equivalent, just taxation would be regarded as a debt of honor and would require no law to enforce its collection. Take the so-called debts of honor, that is, debts not recognized by the law, and it is proverbial that such debts are more promptly paid than those that can be evaded. Men take delight in cheating the law. I want you to think of this. Everywhere government and the law are regarded as a thing apart from humanity, and we find men who would no sooner wrong or defraud a fellow-man than commit a willful crime evading the law and taking advantage of every opportunity to increase their wealth at the expense of government. Men who would scorn to take advantage of their neighbor are daily conniving to take advantage of government. Why is it? Even ministers of the gospel—those good shepherds who are supposed to teach their flocks by their own bright example—are found evading some petty provision of the law. Perhaps the most conspicuous instance of this evasion is shown in the disregard for the laws governing the tariff. This tax is systematically evaded even by those who are its most important defenders. I tell you, friends, that all governmental supervision of the commerce and morals of the people is in itself wrong, and we submit to its imposition because we are cowards. As Mr. Pentecost has shown, "we fear the bother of resistance." We submit to the indignities of the custom house, we move on at the order of the petty policeman, we scarcely dare to say our soul's our own for fear of being hauled before the courts and our names paraded in the morning papers. And yet it is our support that enables these nuisances to roam our streets, to don the ermin of authority, and rule us with a rod of fear. We should wash our hands of politics and we may then say to the miserable ghost of government with more truth than Macbeth uttered:

> Shake not thy gory locks at me,
> Thou canst not say I did it.

Did Christianity Create Hospitals and Asylums?

Agnosticus in the Evening Telegram.

R. Bosworth Smith, M.A, of Trinity College, Oxford, says, "Hospitals are the direct outcome of Buddhism; and lunatic asylums are the result of Mohammedan influence."

Emily Adams, in the New Ideal, informs us that dispensaries were in existence in the eleventh century B.C. in Egypt, that hospitals existed in the fourth century B.C. in India, in the fifth century B.C. in Athens; and the Egyptians and Greeks—prior to the Christian era—provided for the insane; that the Mohammedans built insane asylums in the seventh century, while the first Christian asylum for the insane was not built until 1409.

Lecky says, "The Mohammedans preceded the Christians in the establishment of lunatic asylums."

Judge Richard B. Westbrook, of Philadelphia, says:—"Four hundred years before Christ an emperor of India established hospitals throughout his empire. Ancient Greece had many charitable institutions. Even hospitals for the lower animals existed among the pagans."

Hon. Andrew D. White says:—"In the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries the Arabs and Turks made a large and merciful provision for lunatics.

"The Moslem treatment of the insane has been infinitly more merciful than the system universal throughout Christendom."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Newark Liberal League, 177 Halsey street, corner of Market.—Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, January 31st, Hugh O. Pentecost, of New York, will lecture. Subject: "Religious Lunacy."

AT the Educational Gymnasium, 104 East 66th street, Sunday, January 31st, 4 P.M., Dr. Duren J. H. Ward will lecture on "Church, State, and Individual." These lectures are a new kind of human enterprise—religion and education treated by the facts of evolution.

FRIENDSHIP Liberal League of Philadelphia will commemorate the anniversary birthday of Thomas Paine at their hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, January 31st, at 2:30 and 7:30 P.M., with appropriate exercises. Able talent has been secured for this occasion. Liberals throughout the vicinity are cordially invited to participate with us in making this occasion a memorable one.

NAPLES, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Heston is admirable. I was alone when I opened the last paper, and I laughed at "David's God" till I thought I should hav to call for help. For inventiv genius and a just appreciation of the ludicrous he stands without a rival. His resources seem to be almost infinit. I do not believe he has an equal on earth. PECK.

BROOKSIDE, N. J., Jan. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The scriptures say, "With all thy gettings get wisdom." That is what I want more of. I hav read the "Age of Reason," "Essay on Dreams," some of Ingersoll's lectures, and a good lot of your valuable TRUTH SEEKERS, sent to me by a friend, and for all these blessings I am thankful. I remain, DEFIANCE, O., Jan. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper I ever read. I could not get on without it and be happy. If I could only help THE TRUTH SEEKER! I hav tried so many times to get a subscriber. There are quite a good many Freethinkers in this place, but they are indifferent. They are satisfied other people can think as they like, is what a good many say.

Please send me a catalog of your books.

Devotion to the Cause.

GAINESVILLE, TEX., Dec. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a great deal of fun with the sky-pilots since I became a subscriber to the best paper I ever read in my life. With it and the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," and the "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," I do surely floor them every time. My Liberal friends, get these books from the Truth Seeker Publishing Company. Post yourselvs and we will be able in a short time to send a new subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that will be a great help to spread the truth. I see the Editor is not afraid, either, to tell the good news of Freethought, and let's all help him in this work.

"A Monkey Show."

MADISON, KAN., Dec. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We send $3 to pay for the best paper we hav ever read. Mr. Remsburg was in Madison two weeks ago. His address before the people was on Thomas Paine. It was a success. The people spoke highly of the lecture. We are having a revival in our neighborhood by the Rev. Mr. Maxwell, a stranger in these parts. He claims to be a reformed Infidel. He has been abusing the Infidels for seven nights with a crowded house, but has made no converts yet. The audience will not hold up a finger to encourage him. He is about to close his monkey show. He has told many lies, and there are many people here that know they are lies. I think this would be a good time to show him up. I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER you will furnish free sample pages, pictuers and text, of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. I will do either or both. Yours for truth,

LILLIE J. CROGHAN.

Fetched a Shot from the Coward's Castle.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Jan. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We enjoyed a treat the past week in hearing two good lectures from Mr. Charlesworth. The attendance the first night was not large; the second night there were three times as many as the first night, and if we could hav kept him for the week we could hav filled the largest hall in the city, as he gave a fine lecture and took with our people well. We hope to hav him again next summer, and will try to keep him a week at least. Not one of our ministers attended his lectures, but one of them, after Mr. Charlesworth was at a safe distance, came out in our daily (but had not the courage to sign his name) and pitched into him and other Freethinkers in a truly Christian spirit by calling us many hard names. It is with pleasure that I can recommend Mr. Charlesworth as a fine talker and close reasoner. F. D. REXFORD.

As Tricky as Priests.

CERES, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to Mr. E. J. Leavitt, of Sacramento, Cal., of November 27th, in regard to Mrs. Annie Abbott's performances, I will say that the Hurst woman that was in New York seven years ago was exposed in THE TRUTH SEEKER in the issue for March 21st or 28th, I forget which date. I think it was E. B. Foote that exposed her. He said that when she raised a chair without contact with it she had a piece of annealed wire around her wrist with a piece of lead on the other end, and when she wished to raise the chair she stood behind it and moved her hand quickly over the back of it, which caused the pellet of lead to pass beneath the back and up to her hand and she seized it with or between her fingers and raised the chair. Another trick was to try and hav four men hold the chair down. She did not touch it, but two of the men were confederates and sat on the sides of the chair with their backs together and seized the chair with both hands, and let the other two get on the best they could, and then straightened their knees and hips and lifted the chair, and they moved the chair in any direction that she did her hand and then fell over on the stage as if they could not help themselvs.

I hav never seen either of the Georgia Magnets, so I do not know how many tricks they do perform.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the noble efforts of the lecturers.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a list of persons that I know would like copies of your paper, and ought to take it. I hav come to the conclusion that it is not my forte to get subscribers. I hav always kept my paper a-going as long as it would hold together. All seem to want it, and they read it too. I also hav quite a large number of books out doing missionary service, and they are having their effect. Yet I must say that I hav been surprised at the time it takes to cultivate a taste for such reading. It seems with many like beginning life anew. Still, I can see that interest growing, slowly, but surely. I think before long it must come to the surface. Ingersoll's lecture in Chicago is all the go here. Everybody wants to read it. I think a million copies of it should be circulated in pamphlet form. It is these small pamphlets that serve as the entering wedge to something larger. I notice in my last TRUTH SEEKER a Detroiter givs the Rev. De Witt Talmage a few pointers over his speech in that place. His speech at the university at Ann Arbor has been the subject of much criticism. He could not bite it off until he had given the Infidels a whirl, as well as Jonah and the whale. He said among other things that the Infidel of to-day could not let the bones of his Christian father lie in peace, but must run his swine's snout into his grave, etc. Now, if any mortal has ever run his swine's snout any farther into a grave than he has into Thomas Paine's grave, he would be a curiosity to see. Notwithstanding the ring that Paine inserted into his snout, he has persistently worked his way down until but the tips of his ears are aboveground.

I shall continue in the future what I hav done in the past, in a quiet way to help on the good cause. JAS. P. DICKINSON.

Show the Truth on the Church at the World's Fair.

CENTRALIA, Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav watched the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time to see if some of your many readers would not respond to the suggestion made some time ago by one of your correspondents in regard to the Liberals or Freethinkers having an exhibition at the World's Fair. Now that the church people are making such an effort to show at the World's Fair what they hav done, I propose that we Infidels turn in and help them, and will giv you an outline of my idea of what we ought to do. That is to apply immediately for space and erect a building with a large sign in front: "Progress of the church." In the building hav represented all the instruments of torture that history tells us they hav used on heretics—the thumb-screw, the rack, wheel, spikes, and many others. Then hav represented in wax figures, life-sized, some of their acts toward the promoters of science—for instance, Kepler being driven from the university for giving the fundamental principles of astronomy, Galileo in a dungeon for daring to assert that the world moved, Bruno being burnt at the stake for the cause of science, Servetus burnt to death with green sticks by that great divine John Calvin. Then we might hav a representation of women in our United States tied to ox-carts, stripped to the waist, being whipped for the crime of being Quakers. Then, if we had space, you might hav a representation of hanging witches; then call on Brother Heston for a picture representing the four hundred women taken out on the public square and burnt at the stake in the city of Tulos in one day for that blessed text in the Bible, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." It looks to me as if we could make a splendid showing for the church. I will giv $5 toward this exhibition, and if need be $10. If the Freethinkers of the United States will take hold we ought to raise a half million dollars in the next three months for this glorious cause, and can if we go to work. Let's be up and doing. We will never hav another opportunity in our lifetime like this of showing to the world the progress of the church.

Yours for truth and justice,

A. H. BONSTEEL.

On Liberty, and the Negro.

RUTLAND, VT., Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: George Wilson, Lexington, Mo., writes a very curious letter in your issue of January 2d. He says he wrote a pamphlet to the same effect about five years ago. My! I would like to see that pamphlet if it would take the kinks out of his letter. He appears to be writing on political economy before he has finished his study.

In an editorial—same date—you quote Professor Oswald as saying: "With the rarest exceptions the political economists of our Southern states agree that the agricultural negro as a freeman is a more valuable laborer than as a slave, and that emancipation, in a long run, has benefited the planter as well as the serf." Which amounts to saying that, although the negro has been declared a free man, he is cheaper labor for the planter than before emancipation; that is, he is more of a slave than before; which is undoubtedly true. For, taken in the sense the professor intends it, the freeman, as laborer, is incited to greater activity by a sense of self-dependence, which makes him of more value to his employer; and his employer, being relieved of the responsibility of his maintenance, possesses the power to use him to the best advantage and as he needs him.

The question is: Why should the laborer be dependent upon an employer, and how can the laborer be called a free man as long as he is thus dependent? Being dependent, he is a slave; and the greater the dependence the greater the slavery. The laboring man should be the freest man in the world; he produces all the wealth of the world, and if he was not restricted by man-made laws in the free use of the natural opportunities upon which to apply his labor, and the freeborn right to exchange the products of his labor with whom he pleases and for what he pleases, he would be the most independent man in the world. Surely, "Liberty, liberty, liberty, is the watchword that must be ever on our lips." But as long as we each persist in enforcing our little notions of restricting the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," the word liberty will be but the sound of hollow mockery.

A. A. ORCUTT.

Detroit Investigators' Society.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The above is the name of a new organization, which has held the Liberal fort at 32 Monroe avenue during the past month, giving fair signs of longevity, there being thirty-one names on the roll. Several ladies hav enlisted. Mr. Eugene Ebel should be first mentioned as a most important supporter, as he has given the use of a most pleasant meeting-place as his membership fee. Our rules are: Free speech, free hearing, and sharp criticism on all subjects. John Prescott Guild, the sledgehammer correspondent of the Freethought papers, has favored us from the outset with his timely suggestions and literary contributions. On the first Sabbath evening he read an essay on Freethought versus Dogmatism, which was a thoroughly analytical and well-worded article. Carl Blitz, D.D. (Damned Dutchman), on our second "Lord's day" read an entertaining and complete report of what the devil said to Christ when he took him up on the high mountain and offered him the earth for a prayer to his satanic majesty. It was a most scathing piece of sarcasm, portraying the common practice of Christians to-day. Mr. Guild then recited a witty rhymed synopsis of the Presbyterian parson, W. W. Carson's, recent sermon, in which he undertook to tell why he was not a horrid Infidel, Mr. Gould going on with the song by dissecting him and doing him up with his own twine. Our third Sunday was improved by Prof. L. C. Snell, phrenological lecturer, who talked on "Hereditary Descent," arguing that the most important period of an individual's education is the twelv months next preceding birth. On our fourth and last coming together for a feast of reason and fire of criticism, Mr. Guild again won favor by a spicy and pointed presentment of "The Gospel According to Satan; or, The Bearing of Science and Philosophy, Theology and Humanity." Mr. Gould will speak wherever desired. He is a "whole team." His present address is 74 Farrar street, this city. I do not know how many of our members take Liberal papers. I hav taken several old copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the hall to pass around, and I hav many more. If you wish to send printed matter for distribution I will cheerfully put it to the best possible use.

Church Taxation, Etc.

PORTLAND, ME., Jan. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You will please permit me to giv you my opinion on a few of the leading topics which, according to my opinion, are worthy of the highest consideration. The first and main issue is church taxation, which looks very insignificant in the eyes of the average taxpayer, but is of deep concern to the people of the several states when dollars and cents are concerned. If we could only form a rough calculation of what the extent of church taxation would be, provided there was a reasonable equalization of property, it would be enough to cause a sensation among an outraged people. People say a good deal about church and state in other countries, but we hav a worse system in these so-called United States of America. The average taxpayer does not see that the several states in the Union, or the people of the several states, are paying church taxes from one end of the Union to the other. You ask, How can that be? I will tell you how it is. When you exempt anything from taxation which ought to be entitled to taxation, you are paying the taxes which ought to be paid by that thing—church or convent. The Catholic church is nothing more than a heathen corporation to extract money from the ignorant devils, Irish and Italians. The ignorant members of the so-called Catholic church hav not the money themselvs, but somehow they starve the body to giv to the papist hellhounds, besides the so-called sisters of charity. There is more deviltry going on in these convents than people are aware of.

I wish to God that some one interested would make an estimate of how much taxes the several states would hav above what they hav at the present time, if all churches and Catholic convents and Catholic schoolhouses were taxed in proportion to the valuation of other property. I am in favor of taxing every society, but especially those Catholic nurseries and convents. And I go as far as saying that the government of the United States ought to appoint inspectors to inspect those convents to see that they are not making counterfeit money or distilling whisky, which I think they are, in some out-of-the-way places. Between churches and missionaries I think there will be no money left in the United States in the next twenty years. It is frightful to see people taking these matters so easy. It was nothing but the Catholic church which made Italy and Spain so poor.

Just imagin nice young ladies teaching those old Chinese, one at a time, and all John wants is to learn the language of this country, and try his wiles on his teacher, which he most generally succeeds in. How much do you think of solid cash leaves these United States every year for missionary purposes, which is doing no earthly or heavenly good whatever? I would be ever so much obliged if you will find out all—that is, missionary money, and church taxes provided the different kinds of church property were taxed.

I wish to say a few words about the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. I think that the churches are running into the habits of the Dark Ages. They want to run people's consciences as well as their state. And it is time to call a halt.

Yours respectfully, THOS. HAUS.

Fans the Blaze of Freethought.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Brother in the good cause, I send you $10, to pay up all indebtedness to date, and the overplus to be used as you think best, and to be considered as a token of gratitude to all who lend a hand to free mankind from the chains of mental slavery to priestcraft and superstition. It is surprising what fools men and women make of themselvs in gulping down the old "fads," fables, and myths of pagan superstition in this age of science and demonstrated truth. But so it goes. Children's minds are crowded full of it, reason is dethroned, and they cannot see the light. What think you folks of the Secular Union? Is it in good running order now? I hav been looking for an editorial as to the capacity and fitness of the present official board. We need to hav more peace and harmony, or good-bye to Secular Unions.

I want you to tell us what the great society for investigating spiritual phenomena has done. Hav they brought out any proof that we liv after we are dead? If they hav, I want to know it. If I hav got to go to that "far happy land, where saints in glory stand," I hav got to slick up a little and get a new hat and a new pair of boots. What hav they reported? Tell us, Eugene.

I am afraid the church party will yet be victorious and close the gates at Chicago on Sundays. But I hope not. If any of you are there drop a postal-card so I can find you. I hope to liv to be there myself, though I am almost eighty-eight now. My wife is almost ninety. Our time is short. But death, with my philosophy, will come to me as a friend, not a foe.

It is sad to lose Monroe. His words had the ring of the true metal. I must send the Ironclad Age a little token, surely. You see, I sprinkle my donations all round, rewarding according to work, on a principle I would suggest to the officers of the American Secular Union as the best policy they can adopt—let all be field secretaries, and let all be paid as justice dictates as far as the money in the treasury goes, and all work in harmony. Reynolds is doing splendid work in Washington. Shaw "makes the fur fly" some in Texas when York helps him. Ravlin is doing good work. And other good fellows are on the warpath. What has become of poor Chainey? Has he gone up out of sight to hunt for Madam Blavatsky? Drop me a line that I may know if you get the $10. Success to you all and a happy new year.

Commendable Missionary Work.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: About two months ago the Elmira Daily Advertiser of this city, which I take regularly, published a column article copied from the Church News, a religious journal edited by Rev. Uri Mulford, of Woodhull, Steuben county, N. Y., claiming that the Christian church is the "bulwark of civilization" and classing Freethinkers, Agnostics, and Rationalists with Anarchists, Communists, Socialists, etc. To this onslaught I made an extended reply through the columns of the Advertiser, but only about half of the article was published—a copy of which I think I sent you at the time. The next week brought out a reply from Rev. Uri Mulford through the same paper, which was gladly (and, I must also say, to the credit of the Advertiser editor, fairly) printed. Several articles hav already passed between us alternately, and as the discussion continued I bore down harder and more severely on the Christian church and its revamped system, Christianity, showing absolute respect for my opponent, Mr. Mulford, but showing no mercy at all for the Christian church and its system. To repeat, the editor of the Advertiser has been reasonably fair with me, considering the fact that the great majority of his subscribers are Christians, professedly or nominally; but he has politely refused to publish my last article; and, not to be unreasonable, I think I hav been giving a truer history of the Christian church, the Christian religion, its influence on civilization, etc., than he cared to publish for the reading of his subscribers, fearful it would lose him patronage, prestige, influence, etc., within the range of his paper, which is circulated widely through northern Pennsylvania and southern New York. Though quite liberal himself and publishing liberal editorials and liberal articles from other papers occasionally, I believe he hardly dares to continue to publish my replies to Mr. Mulford. At least, he writes me that he cannot longer publish them, claiming, "No room in the columns." The only unfairness I can see is that Mr. Mulford's replies were promptly published, while mine would be delayed one week, or even longer, and that he refused altogether the last reply. Now, not to be beaten, I hav had a large quantity of my last reply published in pamphlet form and am now mailing them extensivly all over the Advertiser's circulation. I inclose two to you in this communication, which I hastily forward, or more. I will reach one thousand readers by this method. Each paper here in Elmira gets two copies, also all papers to my knowledge within this vicinity. Each postmaster also gets a copy, and several ministers of the greater caliber also get a copy in this city. Too long and often hav the Freethinkers been anathematized and their writing suppressed. Since this discussion started probably there has been said more against the church and the entire Christian system, to the astonishment of Christians, especially here in Elmira, than ever before.

Yours, etc., L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

The Struggles of the Human Soul and Race.

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We hear much of the genesis of thought. Herbert Spencer's persistence of force holds that process with an iron chain. Bolingbroke spoke recklessly of "shocks from without" which could create a soul under the ribs of death. Plato, with deep penetration, hints that comparison is founded on feeling. Could you see without an optic nerve? Action, connected with feeling, soon givs us an idea of cause and effect. God's field of operations is nature, which causes him to fall into disgrace. Chance and necessity strive for the mastery, and nothing hinders their supremacy but the half-god in nature which feels its way along, one blind experiment after another being tried, plunging living beings into an agony from which the soul arises livid with pain. The experiment which caused the creation of the world might be said to be unsuccessful in what was designed, and nearly over.

Reaction alone is master of causes. When it commences we feel that sensitivness and life are creating all the attributes of soul. The side-shows and outrages of hypnotism prevent human beings from being gods. The night side, or religious side, of nature, does not promote benevolence or true evolution. Let us deal with what we can see, and dismiss dreams, nightmares, as well as all abnormal influences which mislead and betray. The days of witchcraft are not over, but the witches and spooks are not hanged. As long as it is possible for tricksters to place something of which we hav an indistinct idea above the realities of life, they hav the advantage, and progress languishes and practical matters hav no chance.

The great master minds, or gods, of reform, are Bennett, Wilberforce, Adler, and Father Matthew, with faces of angels.

To what do these considerations point? We hav plenty of science, and God has given us oceans of love-powders, but they are not strong enough to turn science into love, to cause Atheists to be philanthropists. But if such a movement were well carried out nothing could stand before the Freethought cause. Christ had sense enough to commence that way, and Mohammed, who protected women from insult and babes from being murdered.

A suffering Infidel should always find a kind Infidel to help him. Providence has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

The human race is on the back track in a quagmire of vice or poverty. What hope for them, unless some convulsion throws up gold? When we knock at the dull gates of inertia mind disappears. "Vaulting ambition," without the wish to do good, reaches high and falls over on the other side. The human race has its orbit, and reaches its culminating point, when increasing refinement, with its attendant luxury, consumes activity, and inertia again is master of the situation. The galley slave of its own appetites sinks again. Only the pure can pass the Rubicon, cross the boundary line and rise into a higher sphere.

History reveals the roots of a feudal system, and even now a deadly simoom lays bare the rocks of oblivion, that of the present régime. Already the powerful few with pale lips whisper that their dwellings are no longer safe. They must retreat behind walls and fortifications to shield them from the fierce mob, from the terrors of explosions, destruction, and death.

Instead of Anarchy, even the purest, a disguised tyranny called Socialism will assert its power, or many of the poor will be glad to fly to the bondage of feudalism, as thousands might retreat to caverns when the ice age is again upon them and the last star of hope has abandoned the sky.

But to wander—a new idea of immortality in the Century for November is attracting great attention: "Mind, being the great force of the universe, must of course endure." This view ignores the fact that every mutation of thought is the result of dynamic impression. ALHAZA.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the price named.

"The Churches and the Pews" is the title of a lecture by W. J. Woolsey before a large audience in St. Paul, Minn. Price, 10 cents.

Twenty-five cents buys the "Amerikanischer Turner-Kalendar" for 1892, a German Freethought almanac of literary worth and general usefulness. Address the Freidenker Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis.

"Holiday Stories," by Stephen Fiske, price 50 cents, are as entertaining now as before New Year's. They are bright, frisky, and breezy, and will serve to while away an idle hour on a train or when weary of work. Published by B. R. Tucker.

Mr. Thomas P. Fletcher, of Elk Falls, Kan., has embodied his ideas of "The Origin, Development, and Destiny of Man" in a work of that title, published by H. & L. Vincent, Indianapolis. No price is given, but it is probably about one dollar.

Colby & Rich, Boston, hav published a neat little book called "Starnos: Quotations from the Inspired Writings of Andrew Jackson Davis, Seer of the Harmonial Philosophy." The quotations were selected by Della E. Davis, M.D. The price of the book is 50 cents.

George N. Hill has written "Ten Lessons in True Moral Dignity," which he calls "A Manual of Self-Respect." His idea is "to help humanity to liv the most respecting and therefore deservedly the most respected of lives." The pamphlet has sixteen pages, and sells for 10 cents.

Another "preaching story" is "The Anarchist," by J. H. Mackay, published by B. R. Tucker. It pretends to be a picture of civilization at the close of the nineteenth century. It is really a book of exceedingly little merit, either as a "picture" or work of fiction. Price, 50 cents.

"A Sound-English Primer," by Augustin Knoflach, is for the purpose of teaching children to read in a few weeks, and the system is said to be very successful. Any person wishing to join a normal class for instruction in the use of the "Sound-English Primer" may address A. Knoflach, 109 East 59th street, New York city.

The "Quintessence of Ibsenism," by G. Bernard Shaw, is published by B. R. Tucker, of Boston, for 25 cents. Mr. Shaw sets forth the meaning of the poet Ibsen's plays, sometimes discovering a meaning where Ibsen himself did not know one existed. Those who like to "discuss Ibsen" will find the book helpful.

Grant Allen wrote a book, "What's Bred in the Bone," some time ago that was worth the price. But the "Duchess of Powysland," published by B. R. Tucker, is a great falling-off. It is a commonplace sort of English novel, its only merit being a good-enough literary style and its sarcasm on "society" in England. Price, 35 cents.

Scout Allison, who is a Freethinker, has written up the part he took in obtaining the surrender of Sitting Bull, ten years ago. The story is simply told, but cannot hide the dangers of frontier life and the bravery of the persons who hav to deal with treacherous Indians. The book is printed by the Walker Printing Co., Dayton, O.

The Columbia Daily Calendar comes to hand for 1892. It is in the form of a pad containing 367 leaves, each 5⅛x2⅝ inches; and each slip bears a short paragraph pertaining to cycling or some kindred subject, and at the bottom of each leaf is a blank for memoranda. This is the seventh issue of this now well-known calendar, yet all the matter is fresh and new.

"The Whirlwind Sown and Reaped." The story of the misdoings of a young preacher—a story of treachery to a girl, and the base efforts of the traitor to evade the consequences. Founded on facts known to Saladin, the author. It is written in Mr. Ross's weirdly energetic style, with streaks of grim humor thrown in. I is a book bad for the preachers. Price, 50 cents.

"Shorthand and Typewriting" is the title of a new work by Dugald McKillop, which opens with a brief sketch of shorthand history, followed by practical suggestions to the learner of the art. Following this a chapter is devoted to the amanuensis. The chapter following is for the reporter. Next are taken up typewriters and typewriting, and in connection with this are given illustrations of the leading machines and other appliances used in connection with typewriting work, with suggestions as to the proper use of the leading machines, the acquiring of speed, etc. The book is sold in paper at 40 cents, or a cloth edition at 75 cents.

Mr. A. Jacobson thinks that if all the young people under twenty were taken from labor wages would at once rise. To do this he would pay parents for their children's time—from $50 to $300 per year, according to age. To get the money he would tax all inheritance heavily. He explains this scheme in detail and argues for it in a pamphlet which he calls "Better Times for Us All." Price, 25 cents.

Volume VIII of the Converted Catholic is the bound numbers of a magazine published in the interest of evangelical Christianity against Catholicism. It is valuable only for its exposures of the Romish church. The editor conducts a mission at 142 West 21st street, this city, for the purpose of making Rome's slaves Protestantism's servants. His success appears to be about as great as attends the effort to convert the Jews.

Perhaps the most notable periodical publication in the agricultural world is the American Agriculturist for January, celebrating the beginning of its second half century. It is a number of 108 pages, embellished with 143 original illustrations. Opening with a brief sketch of the magazine and portraits of its editors and contributors, the leading article is by James R. Dodge, the government statistician, on "A Half Century's Progress in Agriculture." Occupying several pages, this article is itself a monument to the wonderful development of our greatest industry, and the illustrations of implements in use only fifty years ago show the marvelous progress in farm machinery. The Agriculturist is published by the Orange Judd Co., 52 Lafayette place.

"Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist?" is a book made somewhat notorious by the fact that a Western editor is suing THE TRUTH SEEKER for a fabulous sum because one of our correspondents said his indorsement of the author's claim that Lincoln was a Spiritualist made or helped to make him something of a Spiritualistic humbug. But, nevertheless, the statements in the book hav been denied by people in a position to know whether Lincoln believed in Spiritualism, though aside from that the book would never establish the claim, and the indorsement of the Western scribe adds nothing to its value. Mr. John E. Remsburg, in a series of papers published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, has much more firmly established the claim that he was an Infidel, though, for that matter, he might hav been both. But that he was the former there has as yet been no reliable evidence published. The price of the book is $1.50.

Alonzo I. Jones, editor of the American Sentinel, has published through the Seventh Day Adventist house, of Battle Creek, Mich., a thick book called "The Two Republics." It is a consideration of the inter-relationship of government and religion, with special reference to Rome. Mr. Jones's object is to keep religion out of the United States government, and he dwells at much length on the efforts to unite church and state now being made by the National Reform Association, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the American Sabbath Union, with which our readers are familiar. Mr. Jones is working on strictly Secular lines, though in this voluminous work he defends Christianity as he sees it, which is through Adventist spectacles, and devotes much space to relating the grievances and persecutions of that sect by their Christian brethren. The book is profusely illustrated. Price, $2.50—sold by subscription, but may be had by addressing the Review and Herald, Battle Creek, Mich.

Lovers of outdoor life and sports compelled to plod in dusty city offices, with no trees and grass in sight from the windows, only bricks and stones and disagreeable people, can get a breath of fresh air and a smell of the woods from Captain Charles A. J. Farrar's books just issued by Lee & Shepard, Boston, "Camp Life in the Wilderness," and "From Lake to Lake," price, $1.25 each. "Camp Life" is in its third edition, and both books are generously illustrated. "Camp Life" gives the haps and mishaps, humorously told, of a party of Boston men who spent a summer in the Rangeley lake region, in Maine, and though there is perhaps a little too much commonplace conversation reported and some incidents too trifling for mention, the author is a true lover of nature, impressed with its beauties and charitable toward its disagreeable features, and the book brings the lake breeze and the forest fragrance to the pent-up city drudge whose fingers itch for the fishing-rod and the breech-loader. "From Lake to Lake" is the record of a trip from Richardson to Parmachenee lake—a story of adventure in Maine's watery and wooded wildernesses. Like the other, it brings pleasant reminiscences to him who has camped and tramped in the forest and lured fish from fresh-water lakes. The two books might well be printed in the interests of the state of Maine, for they are calculated to draw people within its borders and keep them there all summer and late in the fall.

Anyone who desires to be politically miserable should send fifty cents for Lester C. Hubbard's "Coming Climax in the Destinies of America." According to Mr. Hubbard the country, through grasping capitalism, is going to the devil pretty fast, and he thinks that his book shows the readiest way to prevent it. Ignatius Donnelly seems to agree with him. The book is advertised as "the Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the economic question, but is heralded as "the text-book for the reform campaign of 1892." And the nature of the volume may be further learned from this announcement: "It treats of the past but handles exhaustivly the present status of the conflict between the American plutocrat and the American producer. It goes daringly into the future, and prophesies as to the exact nature of the tragedy that may soon come to the country unless righteous reforms are soon given." Mr. Hubbard is chairman of the state sentral committee for Illinois of the People's party. The price of the book is 50 cents in paper and $1.50 in cloth.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Willie's Dream.

Willie trudged o'er the fields one day
To learn about the Lord and pray;
The priest so ranted, to make display,
That Will was sorely frightened.

That night, as he lay on his bed,
Strange fancies coursed through his head,
Filling poor Will with fear and dread;
For he was not enlightened.

He slept, and dreamed he saw on high
A fearful light spread o'er the sky,
Revealing that the end was nigh.
Greatly alarming poor Will.

The frightful dream then passed away
Before the dawning of the day,
And in sweet slumber he there lay,
Peaceably, calmly, and still.

When he awoke, the sun had risen;
And, like a man escaped from prison,
He gazed about with indecision;
So mystified was his brain.

On gazing out upon the field,
And calculating the vast yield,
He felt as covered with a shield,
And never to church went again.

National Soldiers' Home, Wis. C. B.

A Vacation Trip To and From a New Settlement.

At 7 o'clock on the morning of May 15, 1883, a couple of friends and myself started for San Jacinto, a new settlement where my brother lived, about eighty miles from my home. The morning was foggy, but when the sun came out it was warm and dusty. We went by Burnel's Point just as the children were going to school, and from there into the Santa Ana canyon. On the left-hand side was a green valley and on the other were bare hills. In this valley were large farms, with vineyards and orchards. The Orange county irrigation ditch ran along the hillside above the farms. The ditch often breaks loose and washes deep gulches through the place, sometimes causing considerable damage. Across the valley we could see the trestle-work and flume of the North Anaheim Water Company spanning a deep narrow gorge. I had always thought I should dislike very much to go over the grades, but it was not so bad as I imagined. I did not mind the first one very much and it was about as steep as any. The next village we came to was Old Santa Ana. There we met a gentleman from our own settlement, who was enjoying (?) the hot weather as well as ourselvs. At noon we stopped by the side of the Santa Ana river, near a high perpendicular cliff of yellow clay on which were hundreds of swallows' nests. After staying there an hour or so, to lunch and let the team rest, we proceeded on to where there was much more beautiful scenery. Ever so many pretty flowers were on the hillside, almost out of a person's reach. There were wild pinks, poppies, roses, and something that looked very much like yellow snapdragons. We next came to the long grade. On the right the majestic half-cone-shaped hill rose almost perpendicular, with an overhanging cliff. This hill was composed of cobblestones and clay, which looked like the work of men. On the other side we could look down forty or fifty feet, on the river, which was wide but very shallow. From the long grade we came to Sycamore Flat, another very pretty place, with its large trees whose wide-spreading branches overhang the road and make it nice and cool; on their trunks are carved the names of a great many people. Here I took the driver's seat and drove till within six miles of Magnolia avenue in Arlington. I pity those who hav to drive all day. Two miles more brought us to the head of the canyon and out upon a broad barren plateau, with nothing to change the landscape but bare hills and large rocks till we arrive at Arlington, about fifteen miles from the canyon. The Magnolia avenue is seven miles long, and about as pretty as any I ever saw. The town is also one of the prettiest in this part of the state. It was about sundown when we arrived there. I never enjoyed any part of the trip as I did this avenue. When about half-way through we stopped for supper, and to rest and feed the horses. It was then seven miles to Riverside, where we stayed all night. The lady with us went shopping in the morning, so we did not start very early. It was very warm and dusty riding. Although it was thirty miles to San Jacinto we arrived there at 1 o'clock P.M.

The next afternoon I went to my brother's place. I stayed there five weeks, and enjoyed real camp life; cooked outdoors; lived in a house 8 x 12, and walked no less than a mile a day and sometimes six. It is a very dry, warm country in the summer. My father's and brother's places are situated in a cove in the hills. On the southwest, west, northwest, and northeast we can see hills of various shapes and sizes, but on the north there is a small valley through which we can see a small portion of the plain north of the hills, and on the southeast there is a broad valley with a few houses scattered around. One day father told me to pack up, for he thought we had better start that evening. So about 6 all being ready, I bade good-bye to my friends and was on the way home. We arrived at one of the neighbor's, eight miles from my brother's, about dusk, and waited until the moon came up about midnight. We were extremely polite that night, bowing all the time and trying to keep each other awake. It was after sunrise when we arrived at Riverside, where we camped, ate our breakfast, and tried to rest. After staying there some time, we started on, still bowing and nodding. Early that afternoon our camp was made at the head of the Santa Ana canyon, where part of the night was spent. Once I woke up and thought I heard some one crying, "Who? Who?" I could not make out for a minute what it was. Nothing but a hoot-owl. At 3 o'clock we were on the road again and arrived home at 8 the next morning. I was almost lost when I got home. Everything looked so large and cool in the house, but outdoors everything seemed shut from view. And thus ended my trip. A LIBERAL.

Correspondence.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Jan. 10, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My name is Lores Goodwin. I liv at the foot of Lookout mountain, in Alton Park, a suburb of Chattanooga.

It is a beautiful place. We can see Walden's ridge, Missionary ridge, Raccoon mountain, and Hooker's battle-ground above the clouds.

I hav a cat, and its name is Timothy Skittlebones, and two pigs; one is named Kapooslum and the other is Bobinet.

Sometimes my schoolmates call my brother and I Infidevils, and we call them Christiandevils.

I am going to be a Freethinker.

Hurrah!!!

I am eleven years old, and the blue-eyed son of my father. LORES L. GOODWIN.

[Let us all giv three cheers for the little Freethinker—the blue-eyed son of his father.—ED. C. C.]

AUSTIN, NEV., Jan. 1, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner. This is my second letter to the Corner, but it was so long since I hav written, I thought I would write again. School will open the 4th of January here, and we are all going to hav a new teacher, but the highest room. I got a nice new cloak for Christmas and several other things. I hav one brother and one little sister four years old. We hav three feet of snow here, and it has been pretty bad. I think we will hav a bad winter. I like to read the Children's Corner.

I would like to hav some of the girls write to me that write to the Children's Corner. I think the poetry that "Uncle Jack" wrote is just fine.

Well, I guess you are getting tired of hearing me talk, and I guess the letter is too long now.

I will close, wishing you a very happy New Year. From your little Liberal,

ALICE MOSS.

[Glad to hear from you, Alice.—ED. C. C.]

COALING, ALA., Jan. 11, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: As I see no letters from here I thought I would write one. There are no Freethought families living near us. There are some who are Freethinkers, but are afraid to say so; but they are not the kind we want. I was at church some time ago and heard the preacher say there are two millions of foreign Infidels coming to the United States every year bearing the bloody flag of Infidelity; but this is not so, for we do not carry the bloody flag. It is the Christian's flag. He again said that if the Christians did not do better than they are doing Infidelity would take the United States in a few more years.

I like to read Mr. George J. Remsburg's letters, for they are always interesting, and I wish I had the collection of curios that he has, and if any of the readers of the Corner will be so kind as to send me anything in the line of which Mr. Remsburg speaks, I will gladly return the favor if it is so I can. Well, I will close for this time, for fear of making my letter too long. Yours for Freethought,

WALTER R. WARD.

PALISADE MINES, CALISTOGA, CAL., Jan. 2, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw my last letter to you in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I thank you for publishing it.

It would make no difference to me, however, if the letters I write to you were not published, for you know I write to you as if you were my friend, and not so that I may see my letters in print.

Do you never answer letters personally?

I hav been a correspondent to Mrs. Slenker for some time, and she writes me such nice letters.

My chicken-raising is of course over for this year. I hav had splendid luck with it, and hav raised some very fine chickens. I wish you could see them.

Our weather has been very pleasant here up to six days ago. For six days we hav had an almost steady downpour of rain.

The creek running down this canyon is very high.

It has been clear all day to-day, but it is not going to remain so for long, I fear, as the sky has been clouding quite a good deal this evening.

It is time for winter to be commencing, though, and even if I do not like the rain I will say nothing. We hav been very fortunate as it is, having pleasant weather so late in the year. Do you not think so?

Mount St. Helena was white with snow for several days lately, as were the cliffs at the head of this canyon.

We hav as yet not had any snow down here in the canyon. I love to snowball.

Do you hav much snow where you liv, dear Miss Wixon?

My mamma is, or was, I should say, a Massachusetts girl, having been born in the town of Quincy.

I hav written quite a long letter, hav I not? I must stop soon.

If you answer letters from "unknowns" such as I, through the mails, please write to me. I should be ever so pleased if you would.

Wishing you a very happy new year, I remain, Yours sincerely,

News of the Week.

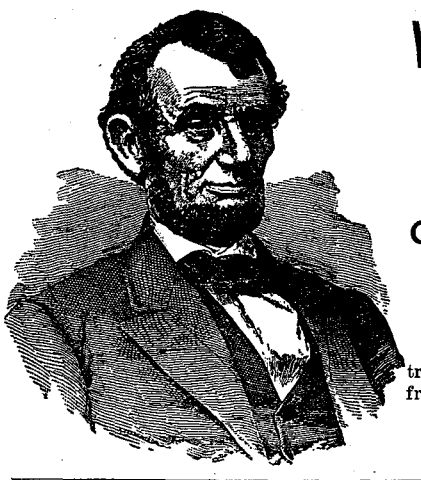
On Christmas Eve during midnight mass in a church at Valenciennes, Spain, four bombs were exploded, wrecking part of the edifice and narrowly missing killing several priests.

The editor of the Osservatore Cattolica, the leading Catholic organ in the north of Italy, has been sentenced to five days' imprisonment and to pay one thousand francs, for insulting the government.

The government under President Diaz in Mexico, in retaliation of the conspiracy of clerics and Garza against it, is closing convents and monasteries and in some cases appropriating their possessions.

The London Lancet givs an analysis of a sample of the bread now eaten in Russia. It consists of woody fiber, husks, leafy matter, seeds, and sand. Experts failed to recognize that the sample was a substance really eaten by human beings.

The conflict between the Vatican and the Italian government continues. The latter is denounced by Catholics as "an organized society of Infidels and Atheists." They say of King Humbert: "By an arbitrary exercise of power he has carried on the work of desecration; by tacit approval of the Bruno and French pilgrim outrages he has become a party to the foulest of crimes."



The directors of the New York Art Museum say that it is by no means settled that it will be kept open Sundays permanently. The $50,000 which Mrs. Stuart once proposed to giv that institution was only a small part of the money that she contemplated giving it if it had stayed closed Sundays. She once wished to giv it her $300,000 collection of paintings. The trustees offered to keep this collection in two special rooms and close these Sundays, but she was not satisfied.

Another French bishop has been reprimanded by the government for going to Rome against its orders. The salary paid him by the state has been stopped. Some Liberals in the French legislativ assembly are so tired of the struggle to make the clergy behave that they advise discontinuance of all government salaries to them, and total separation of church and state. Catholics indignantly exclaim, "Perhaps the French government will order the bishops to ask leave to bless themselvs!" A religious war may result.

The editor of the Berlin Kladderdatsch has escaped punishment on his trial for satirizing the Holy Coat of Jesus at Treves. The prosecution argued that a sufficient case was made out against him in the fact that he had ridiculed an object of veneration to many Germans whose religion is recognized by the state. The defense alleged the spuriousness of the relic, saying that it would be as reasonable to suppose Joseph's coat in Hungary genuin. Disrespect, the defense continued, was not intended for relics in general but only for this one coat.

The president's message to Congress on the 25th reiterated the former demands that Chili make apology and reparation, and withdraw the Matta circular note of December 13th and disavow its sentiments. Later, advices hav been received that Chili withdraws the Matta note and the demand for the supplanting of Minister Egan, and proposes submission of the dissension over the attack on our sailors to arbitration by some neutral nation, or failing of that to a decision by our Supreme Court. This government may refuse arbitration and insist on apology and indemnification. Both countries hav been making hasty preparations for war.

The Russian government allows the publication of no reports on the famin except lies in its own organs, belittling the distress and magnifying the stores on hand. A Polish paper says of the refusal of the censor to exempt from its supervision a medical paper that a society of physicians desires to publish: "To those who are not initiated in the present policy of Russia the refusal to print a purely scientific paper without revision by the censor may appear an arbitrary act, against all reason and common sense. What has the censor to do with the medical science? Is it likely that physicians as scientists would, in their professional journal, publish aught against the government or its officials? But such questions will suggest themselvs only to those who know not what is going on in Russia. The famin this year is mowing away people by the thousands and causing the spread of diseases. The medical science is interested naturally in the study of these subjects. It will try to diagnose the diseases that are caused by hunger, to show the pathological effects of the unhealthy food which is used by the famishing people. All this may, in an indirect manner, convey to the reading public a true knowledge of the state of affairs in Russia, which the government tries to suppress by all means in its power."

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Gems of Thought.

No way of thinking or doing, however ancient, can be trusted without proof.—Thoreau.

SOME make the world think that they believe what they do not; others, in greater numbers, make themselvs think that they believe what they do not.—Montaigne.

IN the olden time, when a plague made its appearance, the people fell upon their knees and died. When pestilence came, they rushed to their cathedrals, they implored their saints—and died. God had no pity upon his ignorant children. At last science came to the rescue. Science—not in the attitude of prayer, with closed eyes, but in the attitude of investigation, with open eyes—looked for and discovered some of the laws of health. Science found that cleanliness was far better than godliness. It said: Do not spend your time in praying; clean your houses, clean your streets, clean yourselvs. This pestilence is not a punishment. Health is not simply a favor of the gods. Health depends upon conditions, and when the conditions are violated disease is inevitable, and no God can save you. Health depends upon your surroundings, and when these are favorable the roses are in your cheeks.—Ingersoll.

I DO not want, O Lord, to go back to your book to find any more traces of you there. There, if you are limned aright, you are a strange compound of an idiot, a coxcomb, a savage, and a fiend. But, as I hav shown, you write such an execrably illegible hand that we fear we hav read your handwriting in a way you never meant it to be read, for which, of course, we shall all be comfortably damned. You wrote in Hebrew, a language which, as I hav pointed out, was not a language, and which had not even a reliable set of alphabetical symbols. We hav done our best to decipher your autograph; but from it we cannot make you out to be anything but a flannel-legged fiend. We recoil with horror from such a finding, and take refuge under the consolation that we must hav wrongly deciphered your cryptography. Perhaps you will remember that your creature, Horace Greeley, used to write a miserable scrawl. One day he sent the following to the Iowa Press Association:

I hav waited till longer waiting would seem discourteous, and now decide that I cannot attend your press meeting next June, as I would do. I find so many cares and duties pressing on me that, with the weight of years, I feel obliged to decline any invitation that takes me over a day's journey from home.

Out of this the recipients, in consultation assembled, made:

I hav wondered all along whether any squirt had denied the scandal about the president meeting Jane in the woods on Saturday. I hav hominy carrots, and R. R. ties more than I could move with eight steer. If eels are blighted, dig them early. Any insinuation that brick ovens are dangerous to hams givs me the horrors.

As far as caligraphy is concerned, I shall, with considerate generosity, class you with Horace Greeley, and thereby indemnify you against the damning evidence of your own book as it is read by mortals.—Saladin in God and His Book.

IN the Middle Ages, that desolate period of nobles' tyranny and fanatical priestly dominion, so-called servants of God had carried things so far that matter was treated with consistent contempt, and that they nailed their own bodies, the noble work of nature, to the pillory. Some crucified themselvs, others tormented themselvs; crowds of Flagellants or self-floggers wandered through the country, openly exhibiting their voluntarily torn bodies; men strove by refined methods to ruin health and strength, in order that the spirit—regarded as something supernatural, as something independent of matter—might gain the victory over its sinful bearer. The saintly Bernard, as Feuerbach relates, so lost his sense of taste by excessiv asceticism, that he ate grease for butter, and drank oil for water. Rostan tells us that in many monasteries the superiors were in the habit of bleeding their monks several times a year, in order to subdue the rebellious passions which the divine service was by itself incapable of containing. But he also informs us that nature trampled upon sometimes avenged herself, and that in these living graves revolts were not uncommon, when the superiors would be threatened with poison and dagger. It has long been known what sad and wretched ascetics are still found among the poor people of India. The consequence is that their glorious land is a prey and they themselvs hav become the slaves of a small number of aliens. A nobler view has shown us that, as Schleicher says, as we degrade matter we in the same proportion degrade the spirit; that as we dishonor nature we injure the universal womb which has conceived and brought forth all of us; that as we ill-use our body we ill-use our spirit, and that he who acts thus injures himself to just the extent that he in his foolish fancy imagins that he has benefited his soul.—Büchner.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5 00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8.00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price, $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Enrope. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the Gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discnssion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

The Issue.

The Sun recently printed an editorial drawing some very clear distinctions between the logical soundness of the positions of the "higher" and the "lower," or traditional, biblical critics. The advantage as to logic is, it thinks, entirely with the latter, because they say exactly what they mean, in terms which cannot be mistaken, while the former beat about the bush and dodge the consequence of their arguments, juggle with words, and pretend that unbelief is only a "larger and more enlightened belief." The "higher" critics apparently, says the Sun, do not want to be understood by anybody, or they dare not themselvs face the consequences of their methods and principles of biblical interpretation. They try to make themselvs and other people believe that they are only putting the authority of the Bible on a more rational basis, when in truth they are destroying it utterly, and along with it the supernatural basis of all theology and religion.

This is precisely what we hav said many times. Two and two make four, and no juggling or interpretation or "rational" criticism can make the sum five. If the Bible was not written by the people it is pretended it is, or if it was not in existence until hundreds of years after its necessary date, then it is valueless for the purpose for which it is used by the church. The Sun pertinently asks the questions, if Moses did not write the Pentateuch, and its authorship is purely conjectural, some of it obviously having been produced thousands of years after his time as a record of Jewish traditions by unknown writers and for the purposes of priestcraft, what remains of the authority of those books or of any part of the Bible as the word of God? If its statements of fact are contradictory and distinct events are confounded, if it is a mere compilation and not an original document, wherein consists its inspiration? If the Bible thus begins with false pretenses, what else in it can be accepted as genuin truth from God any more than the doctrins and speculations of any other book? If the "natural faculties, intellectual and moral," of the compilers of the Pentateuch led them to palm off as the work of Moses four distinct documents which were not his, and which contain duplicate and discrepant statements, and whose diversity of style and matter show they could not hav been written by any one man or at any single period, what sort of reliance can we place on such faculties exercised by other writers of scripture whom we hav been taught to believe inspired and infallible?

Professor Green, of Princeton, puts the case very clearly in the statement that if in ordinary affairs a legal instrument or a piece of commercial paper, for instance, "is not from the source it claims to be, and the signature attached to it is false, it is not worth the paper it is written upon," adding, What credit would be attached to the gospels if instead of being written by well-known Apostles and Evangelists who were contemporaries of Jesus and eye-witnesses of the facts and events they describe, they were composed many centuries after his time by writers whose identity was undiscoverable or purely conjectural?

And so of the professed belief of the "higher" critics in the inspiration of the scriptures. But, to use the words of Professor Green, their idea is in no way inspiration "in its proper and universal sense, as such a divine control over the writers of the scripture as secured their infallibility and guarded them from error. For their theory of inspiration assumes that the writers of the Bible were as liable to error as other men, and that, as Dr. Van Dyke phrases it, 'their natural faculties, intellectual and moral, were freely exercised in the production of the books.'" Undoubtedly, comments the Sun, Colonel Ingersoll himself would be ready to accept inspiration so defined.

The Old and the New Testaments of course must stand on the same doubtful ground. The authority of the New Testament can be no better than that of the Old, "for therein what is assumed by these critics as error is accepted and confirmed as indisputable truth. They deny that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, and say that some of its writers were not earlier than 750 B.C., though 'our Lord and the inspired writers of the New Testament abundantly confirm the claim of the Pentateuch to be regarded as the word of God, for in so doing they uniformly attach to it the name of Moses.' If Jesus and his disciples were deceived as to this point, how can they be believed as infallible in any respect? They also must hav been limited by their 'natural faculties, intellectual and moral.'"

This puts the whole Bible on a human basis, to be judged as any other work is judged. As Colonel Ingersoll says, "if it is true it does not need inspiration, and if it is not true inspiration will not help it," no matter what the Apostles say about it. And the "higher" critics are really helping to destroy the belief in its supernatural origin, no matter what they claim in their sermons to be doing. And it is this fact which makes their labors invaluable to Rationalism, though they may assert themselvs to be "reverent students of the word of God," and evangelical in their creed.

When a citadel is attacked from within by those supposed to be its defenders, and all is confusion and riot inside the walls, the besiegers are likely to win a victory. Rationalism has already modified the faith of the Protestant world to an almost incalculable extent. That it must still further transform it we know from the study of the law of evolution. And it will, probably, not be many years before the line is sharply drawn intellectually and politically between the believers in supernaturalism and the Rationalists. That means, in this country, between the Catholics and the Infidels.

The Failure of the Jew-Converting Mission.

Mr. A. Benjamin's repeated exposures of the Jew-converting missions hav at last made an impression upon one religious journal, and it is to be hoped that the affairs of the "pretty little church," as Mr. Freshman calls his dingy chapel, will now be investigated. The Independent has received the tenth annual report of Mr. Freshman's Hebrew-Christian work and says regarding it:

"We would make an abstract from it, if it were possible, but we cannot find a word of information in it. There are pages on the subject of the necessity of funds to carry on the work, but no account whatever of receipts or disbursements, and the only evidence that any careful account is kept is in the following lines:

"'I hav examined and checked the accounts of the Rev. Jacob Freshman for the year 1891, hav seen the vouchers, and the same is correct.'—Ralph Wells.

"There is no name given of a single convert baptized during the year, nor even the number of such converts. Certain assistants are referred to, but neither their names nor their number is given. From information that comes to us, however, we know that three of those assistants left early in the autumn—Max Winterling, M. Frank, and Louis Schlesinger. The first has renounced Christianity and gone to his parents in Budapest; and we are credibly informed that the other two hav also gone back to Judaism. In their places are three other young men, or two; for we believe that one of the three has left. During the year another of the converts sent by Mr. Freshman as a missionary to another city has been in prison for stealing money from a poor immigrant girl; and others whose names are given to us hav renounced Christianity. If this mission is seeking public support it has no right to claim exemption from making public reports of its finances and of the number of its converts."

So far as converting Jews to Christianity goes, this mission is a swindle. It bribes with food and clothes and cash a few dishonest Jews who would say anything for a dollar and do anything that did not involve personal risk for five dollars. We believe that not five per cent of the alleged converts hav been honest. Their crimes range from counterfeiting to swindling. Some of them hav been baptized in nearly every Jew-converting mission in England and America—for a consideration. They are by nature dishonest and remain so.

These facts hav again and again been brought to the attention of the supporters of Mr. Freshman, but such is the mania of church folks for "converting" somebody that no attention has been paid to the exposures. If Mr. Benjamin were not so persistent a defender of Judaism he would hav become discouraged long ago.

Editorial Notes.

A belief in devils is not a healthy theory. Thomas Connor, of Kirksville, Mo., believes in devils, and further, imagined that they were after him, so he jumped out a second-story window to escape them. Then his Christian friends, who also believe in devils abstractly, put him in an insane asylum, which shows that they don't really believe in devils after all.

The world is full of curious people, some of them fit only for dime museum freaks; and among these latter must be classed the reviewer of the Springfield Republican. In that paper of December 27th this quill-driver reviews "Liberty in Literature," and from the beginning to the end of his screed abuses Colonel Ingersoll like a pickpocket, and all the while agreeing with the whole oration! Such a fool pietist is well worth ten cents to see.

Mr. R. A. Clark, of Selwood, Oregon, is a Presbyterian Prohibitionist, but complains to the Voice that his party is altogether too "churchy." Mr. Clark would be like St. Paul, catching men with guile, and he wants his party to win. So he advises the Voice to drop its religious cant, and the leaders in Prohibition gatherings their prayer-meeting methods. He says: "The strongest Prohibition precinct in the state of Oregon is composed mainly of avowed Infidels, and yet some of these skeptics are amongst the leading Prohibitionists of the state. If the Prohibition party ever attains large proportions it will hav to change the methods which hav governed it in the past. It is votes we want, and we should not forget that the vote of the Infidel, Spiritualist, or the what-not is as potent for good or evil as those of so many Elijahs."

It appears from Secular Thought that the Christians won in the vote on horsecars or no horsecars on Sunday taken in Toronto on January 4th. And the Toronto clericals, it says, will leave no stone unturned to rivet the chains they hav managed to place on the citizens of that city; and a majority of the people appear still to be subject to clerical influence to such an extent as to make it necessary to use all the efforts of which Liberals are capable to produce much impression upon them. Under ordinary circumstances the number who voted for the streetcars—ten thousand—would form a winning majority. The recent discussion of the question marked a very decided advance, and with a fair amount of agitation during the succeeding few months there seems to be every likelihood that the number of sympathizers with the free Sunday will be greatly increased.

The following item from a daily paper will perhaps be shocking to persons who are not acquainted with a certain custom of some Catholic orders: "'Convent hair' is an article well known to the trade and highly prized. When a young woman takes the veil in the Roman Catholic church her hair is cut off, and the tresses are sold for the benefit of the convent. As the hair is cut pretty close to the head, the tresses are usually long, and thus 'convent hair' has a special value." So, too, are the poor young creatures shorn of their wealth, of their freedom, of their joy in life. They are shorn of the sacred joys of wifehood and motherhood. They are shorn of all that is of value. The world as well is despoiled of their sweetness and their services. How long, O Superstition, how long? How long, O Ignorance, Malice, and Cunning?

It is always a difficult matter to know just how to raise money for public objects, but the Lutheran church folks of Burns, Mich., hav hit upon a method which is probably reliable so long as the wicked men in the town possess a cent. The regulation "sociable" was gotten up and after the regulation program of such affairs had been carried out, a curtain at one side of the room was withdrawn and six pretty maidens, blushing to the ears, stood there each with a legend on a card:

YOU MAY KISS ME FOR 25 CENTS.

Immediately there was a scramble by the young and old men present, all of them purchasing at least ten kisses from each girl. Had it not been for the deplorable passion of jealousy it is probable all the church debts would hav been extinguished right there or the town gone broke; but as it was the elder ladies objected and the osculation bee was summarily stopped.

Catholic papers complain of "unmannerly gibes" against their schools. "The parochial schools," they say, "were declared in substance to be lacking in all the qualities essential to good schools. The school buildings were described as mere rookeries for the most part, not merely unsightly, but unwholesome and altogether unsafe as well. As for the teachers, especially those of them who were members of religious orders, it was insinuated, if not charged with brutal and frank falsehood, that they were lacking not only in a knowledge of the art of teaching, but even of those commonplace things which all fairly well-informed people know. . . . So persistent were these attacks on our schools that at length they began to produce an effect even upon some Catholics who ought to hav known better." For our part, we will say that these attacks hav not been "persistent" enough, and that all Catholics ought to hav "known better" than to hav been led to believe anything else. Catholic schools are even more worthless and injurious than appears above.

Perhaps some of our readers, at least of our new readers, are not informed of just what is the nature of the school system which Catholics are striving to impose upon our States, and against which we hav so often inveighed. For their benefit we will copy this clear statement of it from the Catholic Review: "We insist that government should encourage religious teaching in the public schools because it has a direct tendency to promote good morals, and therefore to make good citizens. But as there is no union of church and state among us, and therefore no danger of one denomination being given the preference over all others, the only feasible plan is the denominational plan. That, as we said, is perfectly fair and just, because it givs the preference to no denomination, but treats all alike. The idea is that the government contributes aid to each denomination, or to each association of individuals who choose to hav a school, according to the average number of pupils in each school, and let each teach its own religion in its own way."

The clergy unweariedly charge the present age which is forsaking their doctrins with sinking into vice, crime, and intemperance as a result. The truth is, however, that there is less of these mispractices than in the Christian ages of the world. As to the latter evil, intemperance, Professor Oswald writes in the Voice that the present tendency is in the direction of temperance. Only a hundred years ago abstinence, and even moderation in the use of intoxicating beverages, could be made the pretext of a social stigma. Prince de Ligne, in his memoirs of European Court-life, admits that he hardly dared to confess his aversion to alcoholic liquors, and both Joseph the Second and the First Napoleon were repeatedly lampooned for their lack of convivial habits. In the light of those facts even the libels of the modern European press must be considered an encouraging sign of the times. The anti-German journals of France and Russia would find it easy enough to convict the eccentric kaiser of autocratic tendencies and a penchant for bombastic speeches, but prefer to impeach him for intemperance and opium-revels.

It would be slandering the canine species to say that the Aspen, Colorado, Daily Times is edited by a dog. But it certainly is not by a man, though it just as certainly is by a Christian. One of our readers sends us an editorial clipped from its columns inspired by the polemical battle between Colonel Ingersoll and the ministers in which occurs a villainous paragraph about the relativs of liberty's great champion, for writing which our reader asks us to "sit down upon the fellow." But what is the use! A religious lie cannot be overtaken and killed. The cries of this Colorado polecat will be echoed by the pious "journalist" and heard ten times farther than the blow of the club which should still it. We are tired of these yarns. There is no use asking us to "deny" them. Every one to whom a Christian retails them can do it, and should do it on the spot. We will say once for all that Colonel Ingersoll's parents were kind and loving people; that he is noble, generous, honorable; that all his relativs are among the best of folks—in short, there is not a spot or stain on him or any of his, and that thousands of Christians who differ with him in nearly everything are eager to bear testimony to the beauty of his home life and the nobility of his character. So please do not ask us to "sit down" on any more of these vermin. Liberals ought to hav sufficient confidence in the greatest of them to turn, revolted, from his traducers. Tell them frankly that they are too contemptible to notice.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, the noted Brooklyn preacher, recently delivered these bold words: "In the past this Bible has been regarded as without error. We hav thought it an authority on theology, and on almost every subject of human knowledge, so that there was no error or mistake in it. But there are very few who hold this opinion now. They think they do, but, if they will consider a little where this opinion will lead them, they will quickly see that they do not. In the first chapter of Genesis we find that the world was made in six days. All geology is mistaken. The day is limited by the rising and the setting of the sun, and we shall hav a theological opinion of the creation for Sunday and a geological opinion for week-days. We go against the biblical institutions of slavery and bigamy and circumcision. We hav abolished slavery and bigamy, and we say that baptism has taken the place of circumcision by a divine decree. The whole system of sacrifices we hav abandoned. The man who thinks he believes in the infallibility of the Bible turns to moral law. He takes the Ten Commandments; they stand as moral standards. He knows they are not. He knows a man may keep every one of the Ten Commandments and yet be not admitted to decent society in New York, and the civilized standards of the nineteenth century in New York are not too high for Christian living. He opens the Bible at a Psalm which asks God not to forgiv, and then at the Sermon on the Mount, which prays God to forgiv all sinners, and he can not reconcile them. Let us be true to ourselvs in this matter. Such things as these confront us if we think." One would expect after all this that the reverend doctor was about to come out and take his stand in the full light of Rationalism. But no! for no sooner has he emerged from his hole of superstition, than around he turns and back into it he runs with the declaration that there is something or other divine about the Bible after all.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE subject of Dr. Ward's regular Sunday lecture at 104 East 66th street—Educational Gymnasium—4 P.M., February 7th, will be "A Pulpit Up to Date, or the Characteristics of a Church for Our Times."

DR. LEWIS G. JANES, president of the Brooklyn Ethical Association, will lecture for the Newark Liberal League next Sunday. His subject will be: "Spencer and Darwin, the Heroes of Science." The Liberal League will observe its fourteenth anniversary on Wednesday evening, February 10th, in Chester Hall, or Republican League Hall, 171 Halsey street, Newark.

News and Notes.

On Monday, January 19th, I attended the funeral services of T. L. Grigsby at Napa City. Mr. Grigsby died suddenly on Saturday, January 17th, at the age of seventy-four years. He was a lifelong Liberal, one of the pioneers of California, always a worker, a man of enterprise, of courage—respected by those who knew him, generous in his support of the principles of Freethought, and ever ready to help his fellow-men. The services were held in Odd Fellows' Hall, under the auspices of the Liberal Association of Napa. Professor Clark, who is now lecturing before this association, joined with me in these memorial services, reading selections from the poets and making a short address. A large number were present of the family and friends of our veteran comrade. The sorrow of death was made beautiful with music and flowers—the gentle memory of the departed and the hopes of our common humanity. There is no terror in death. Our friend lived a good life, he has done his duty, and now in the peaceful majesty of the eternal sleep there are no fears. We mourn the loss of one who has been so brave, so earnest, who has met bright and evil fortune with a manly heart, who is honored as a husband, father, neighbor, and citizen. We shall not forget his cheerful companionship, his sturdy character, his frank and radical thought, his open adherence to unpopular truth, his genial humanitarian and progressiv spirit. We place the flowers upon his grave with tears; we turn to life with nobler hope, because he has been with us, because this world is a happier world for his living in it. He has made the flowers grow on the pathway of toil. He has helped to make the harvests shine for the paradise of this earth.

His wife, of the same age of himself, is now prostrate on a bed of sickness. In this hour of sorrow we giv to her our tenderest sympathy, hoping that the night will turn into dawn again; that her life will be spared for the darkened home and to the hearts that love her still.

The series of four lectures at San Francisco on the "Evolutions of a Century"—preparatory to the Paine celebration and the state convention, has been very successful. The hall has been full every evening, and the subjects hav created great interest. A basis is laid for future work. It was almost a "forlorn hope" at the beginning, but the results giv courage to make new endeavor. We are indebted to Chas. F. Buryman, president of the Freethought Society, for his strenuous labors; to Emil Lemme, to H. W. Walker, and W. H. Eastman, officers of the society, for their generous aid. All did their utmost with the few means in our hands for the promotion of the cause. If it were not for this lack of means, which prevents thorough advertising in the secular press; which does not permit us to hav the inspiration of music which always draws the people—if we could hav these advantages which make the popularity of the church to-day, there is no doubt that an audience of two thousand people could be gathered together in San Francisco to listen to Freethought lectures. As it is we hav to do the best we can and hope on, hope ever.

I hav the same report to make of the Sunday afternoon lectures at San Jose. The attendance has continually increased, and we feel quite hopeful now of future efforts at this point. I am sorry I cannot continue the course of lectures; I must go into other fields. However, we shall some time take up this line of battle again. The orthodox citadel here is well manned, but we mean to giv it the tug of war. The few who do help us at San Jose are true as steel.

The two lectures also at Santa Clara on Saturday evenings, January 16th and 23d, were also an opening wedge, I think, for something better. Here loom the great and solemn edifices of the church of Rome. They frown upon us, and seem to hold a spell upon the community. But we are not going to surrender to these gloomy institutions. There is a large Liberal element in Santa Clara, although but little of it at present is made public.

I enjoyed the hospitable home of John H. Dibble, who is always ready with heart and hand for the cause; also the generous entertainment of Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Woodhams. The campaign has been a pleasant one with these good friends to aid.

Yesterday, Sunday, was one of the loveliest days of this lovely coast. Warm and sweet, the sun poured down, and Santa Clara valley shone like a diamond. The hills were wrapped in a soft cloud of blue, and glittered in bright repose against the radiant sky. On this beautiful morning, with Mr. Woodhams, I attend a unique religious service at Edendale, the home of Mr. Chenoweth, who is the originator of a new religion, somewhat sentimental, but anti-orthodox. Edendale is indeed a garden of delight, much superior, I think, to the garden where Adam and Eve once camped, without any clothes to wear. Here everything is modern, fashionable, and enchanting. Mrs. Chenoweth is rich, and it is a luxury for her to be a heretic. She is worth a million dollars or more. This wealth was made by the discovery of mines, which she says was the work of spirits, but which I think was good luck and business talent. However, she makes a fine use of her money. She has built an elegant residence, and the grounds about it, with noble groves of trees and lovely flowers, and broad pathways, are most attractiv, especially in the bright golden sunshine of this Sunday morning.

Mrs. Chenoweth is an intelligent, business-looking woman. She looks as if she could take care of herself without the aid of spirits. She has a sharp, firm, determined look, and she talks straight to the point. I liked a good deal of what she said. She does not believe in the "little God" of orthodoxy, the "tin God" upon a throne. God is the all in all—manifested in nature, but higher than nature itself—a principle of life radiant in human life. God is not a personality only as he manifests himself in the human soul. He is known, not by thought, but by action. There are no doctrins concerning him—no ideas; but simply feelings. Mrs. Chenoweth thoroughly repudiates the orthodox dogmas about God. She will not define God except as the radiance of life itself, the soul of human goodness.

She accepts the Bible, but simply as a myth. Such a man as Jesus was never born into this world. Jesus is merely an ideal—an expression of human thought—but not a matter of fact. He is a divine fiction. He is not something that has been, but that which is to be in the onward course of man. He is a picture of human destiny. The Bible, therefore, is not to be taken as history, but as a story with a "purpose," to be interpreted by the best that is in us to-day, and not by the ignorance of the past. It will thus be seen that Mrs. Chenoweth's religion is something of a "mixture." It has some good things. It is, however, purely sentimental. It is made up out of the "inner consciousness," and not from the facts of the universe. It has not a particle of evidence in its support. However, it is a pleasant belief. There is no hell-fire in it; no gloom or terror. It would not persecute, but simply persuade. As an attack on orthodoxy and the church and the priest, it is a splendid thing, but as truth and science I reject it. However, I am glad that Mrs. Chenoweth is thus using her millions—building beautiful houses and beautiful chapels, and making music, and cultivating and ornamenting the earth, in order to strike a blow at the hideous religions of the past; to make people happier, at least, if not wiser.

San Francisco, Jan. 25th. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

My Lecture Trip.

The lectures I gave at Angola, Ind., were attended with the usual success that has followed me throughout this pilgrimage. My audiences were even larger than those I had in Waterloo. They were very attentiv and appreciativ, for, although the hall was almost filled, there were times during my address that you might hav heard a pin drop to the floor. The Hon. A. W. Hendry, an aged but sincere Freethinker, presided at both meetings, a service which he performed most admirably; and though the storms of sixty winters hav passed over his head, which hav added a snow-white luster to his locks, he is just as earnest and eager in the faith as in his younger and more activ days. He prefaced the lectures with a few appropriate remarks about miracles and in a jocular manner illustrated a few Bible stories, which thoroughly pleased the audience. On Saturday morning a blinding snow-storm set in, which raged the whole day long and through the night; in consequence of this my second audience was considerably affected. The roads from the country districts were rendered almost impassable, therefore it was too much under such atmospheric conditions to expect our friends from the country, so we had to look for our audience that evening from the townspeople alone; and as the storm had abated nothing in its intensity, we could not hope for many even from them. But nevertheless the lecture was given under brighter conditions than we had anticipated, for a much larger number turned out than we had hoped for. And here let me say that great praise is due to Fremont Robinson for the activ interest he displayed and the efforts he manifested to make our meetings successful.

Angola is the county seat of Steuben county, and situated about ten miles from the Michigan border. It has a population of three thousand, is a somewhat lively little town, and has quite a number of Freethinkers, among them being some of the most prominent and most favored of its citizens; and right glad was I to meet with such friends of our cause as the Hon. W. M. Brown, the county representativ, a successful lawyer and respected citizen; the Hon. A. W. Hendry; the Hon. Judge Furley; Dr. Morse; Gid Finch; H. Freygang, the editor of the Angola Herald, and last, but not the least among our most activ workers, Fremont Robinson and wife. Here again I made many new friends, all of whom expressed a warm friendship and their pleasure at the result of my lectures; and again I had to promis that I would not forget them should I ever visit this part of the country again.

My lectures being over, I had now to face the most disagreeable and unpleasant part of my visit to Angola. This was Saturday night, and I must be in Cincinnati to lecture the next day. In order to reach there I must make a train at Waterloo, on the Lake Shore railroad, for Toledo at 1:25 A.M., but just how to reach Waterloo was an enigma for the time, there being no train that night. We had previously decided that the journey should be made on a hand-car down the track, but owing to the severity of the snow-storm, all ideas of that mode of travel had to be abandoned. Eventually I decided to undertake the journey in a buggy, provided some one could be found to venture the distance upon such a night. A short investigation revealed to us the desired individual, and I at once accepted his services. It was certainly a risky undertaking. The journey occupied three hours and a half, and it was with a glad sense of relief that I was able to stretch my cold and cramped limbs before a warm stove in the depot. At last the train came and I reached Toledo about 5:30 A.M. Sunday. I was still two hundred miles from my destination, and here I found another difficulty confronting me. The train I had expected to make here did not run on Sundays. I turned away with feelings bordering on desperation; but still I could not giv up all hope. By the aid of maps and time-tables I discovered another route by way of Columbus, which would enable me to reach Cincinnati about 5:30 P.M. Of course I decided to take this. To do so, however, I must reach another depot at a distance of two and a half miles by 6:30. It was now five minutes past 6. The storm still raged without. How to reach this other depot on time was another riddle to solve, I being a stranger in a strange town. Fortunately I espied a hack, and prevailed upon the driver to take me over. Off we went like a cyclone, and barely reached there in time, for the train was on the move ere I had placed my foot upon the steps of the car. But again I had succeeded, although the very elements were against me. A roundabout ride all day this Sunday brought me to Cincinnati just twenty-five minutes later than the time announced for the lecture. I had telegraphed to the friends explaining my predicament, so upon my arrival I found Samuel Silverman, whom I had met at the Portsmouth congress, waiting for me with a hack in readiness. We were rapidly driven up to the hall, where I found a very good and patient audience waiting for me, and in less time than it takes me to record it I had commenced my address.

The audience gave me a splendid greeting, and gave way to their feelings with a burst of applause.

W. Ward, the president of the new society, occupied the chair. The services were prefaced by a selection of music and some singing; the audience, joining in with the orchestra, rendered our national anthem, "My Country." This was the first meeting, or, in other words, the inauguration, of the new society. It was undoubtedly a success and speaks well for those at its head. There is certainly good ground here for Freethought work, and by only a little judicious care a strong and useful society can be maintained in Cincinnati. The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic and thoroughly appreciated my address. A good discussion followed the lecture, which was thoroughly enjoyed by all. Next morning the Inquirer gave a very flattering and complimentary notice of the lecture. I met here again another old acquaintance of Portsmouth fame, George E. Light, who did his utmost to make my visit to this city as pleasant as possible; also Dr. Wilson, Professor Beal, of phrenological fame, Andrew Hogg, the secretary of the Union, and many other Freethought friends.

Many years hav passed since a Freethought lecture was given in this place, but the manifested enthusiasm of all present upon this occasion, the inauguration of the Ohio Liberal Society, speaks well indeed for its future success.

I leave here for Columbus, where I shall lecture on the 10th instant.

Friends are requested to address me in care of W. S. Moke, Massillon, O.

Is Miss Ida Craddock an Infidel?

AN UNIMPORTANT SUBJECT DISCUSSED IN AN IMPORTANT MANNER.

I greatly admire Miss Ida Craddock. Her fine article in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for last year proves her to be not only an able thinker, but, what is rare, to be free from miss-nancyism, which is the small vice of so many of otherwise superior women. But she says she feels insulted if anyone is profane enough to call her an Infidel.

Miss Craddock, however, knows that, not only in the dictionaries, but by common parlance, for eighteen hundred years, in the Christian world, an "Infidel" is one who rejects the New Testament, as well as the Old, as the inspired, and therefore infallible, word of God, teaching mankind what they are to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man. She knows that, like the chameleon, the term Infidel changes its color, and depends for its meaning entirely upon the place where it is used as an epithet of reproach. In Turkey, and Arabia, the Christian is the man who is despised, and called an "Infidel dog," because he does not believe in Mohammed as the prophet of God, and in the Koran as the divine revelation, superseding all other so-called revelations. On the contrary, in Europe, and America, it is the followers of Mohammed who are called Infidels, because they do not believe in the New Testament, and the divine character and mission of Jesus of Nazareth; and in the eleventh century of our era, when the Christian world was on tiptoe expectation of the second coming of Christ, to set up his visible kingdom according to his promis, all the nations of Europe combined, and sent their armies to Palestine, and spent the whole of one century, and parts of two others, in war, attempting to deliver the sepulcher of Christ at Jerusalem from the possession of the "Infidel" Mohammedans, and to rebuild the throne of David for the occupancy of David's son.

This then, is the line of demarkation. All who regard the Christian scriptures as the word of God, and the rule of faith and practice, are believers. All who do not are "Infidels." That this word, since the Protestant Reformation, should be a term of reproach is strange, for every intelligent man who wants to know the truth, in his search for it, believes not as he pleases, but as he must. He has no more power to believe, or change his belief, by an act of the will, than he has to change the color of his eyes. What really is, or seems to him, to be, proof, can alone make a man believe, or reject, any given proposition. The Moslem, therefore, is unjust when he attributes hate to the truth as the reason why a Christian investigator rejects the Koran, and the Prophet; and the Christian is equally so, when he reviles the Moslem, or any other man, who, after a sincere examination of the subject, rejects the Christian religion.

Now, suppose Miss Craddock and I hav a catechetical exercise, with the view of testing her knowledge of the Bible, and ascertaining whether she is a Christian believer, or a real Infidel. Then,

1. Do you believe, Miss Ida, in the inspiration, and therefore the infallibility, of that part of the Bible called the five books of Moses?

No. I do not. Bishop Colenso, and later critics eminent in scholarship, hav pointed out in these books many inaccuracies in matters of fact, and many allowances, if not inculcations, of bad morals. Besides, the age of our globe, and the rest of the universe, being not yet six thousand years since their creation; the account given of the formation of Eve out of one of Adam's ribs; the circumstance that Moses describes his own death and burial; together with a large number of similar unlikelihoods, lead me to regard these books, when taken as a whole, to be mainly fabulous.

2. Then, what do you believe, Miss Ida, as to the historical accuracy of the other parts of the Old Testament writings, as, for instance, the conversation said to hav been held between the prophet Balaam and the four-legged ass upon which he rode; and also of the account of another distinguished prophet named Jonah having been swallowed by a whale, and kept in his belly three days and three nights?

Well, my previous criticism must cover these cases too, for implicit confidence cannot be placed in the truth of many passages in the historical writings, when the writers speak of things which they do not understand. They must be relegated to the category of mere legends, or incredible narrativs, which only he can believe who has faith strong enough to uproot mountains, and cast them into the depths of the sea; and the acceptance of them as facts is not absolutely necessary to the formation of Christian character. Solomon, I remember, in the Proverbs, although he was the wisest of men, made mistakes when he touched upon natural history; for he holds up to the sluggard the example of the ant, because she lays up, by diligent labor in the summer, the food necessary for winter use; whereas, the entomologist proves that she does nothing of the kind; but that the whole ant family spend the winter months in a dormant and half-frozen condition. As to Jonah, the Old Testament book of that name does not say it was a whale that took him down, but "a great fish." However, these are mere trifles.

3. Immediately after I asked the preceding questions, Miss Ida, I noticed a curl of your lip, and a smile on your countenance, which struck me as being first cousin to a sneer, at the idea of your believing that such statements could find a place in a revelation made to mankind by almighty God. But when you accept a great principle you must take it with all that necessarily hangs to it; for no truth or falsehood was ever born into the world of thought that came singly. If the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the only true revelation from heaven—which is the fundamental doctrin of Christendom—you hav no right to sit in judgment on its statements, but must believe them implicitly, and all. The trifles, as you call them, stand related to what is deemed essential truths, as for instance, the case of the whale swallowing Jonah. Knowing as you do that, while the mouth of a whale is capacious enough to admit an object as large as a man, its gullet is entirely too narrow to allow it to pass into the stomach, you, like others who hate to giv up the idea of the inspiration, partial, or plenary, of the Bible narrativs, snatch at the Old Testament account of the swallowing feat being performed by a great fish, that, probably, had an esophagus large enough to make the statement credible. But you know that the whale is a warm-blooded mammal, and not a fish; and that the controversy we are now having concerning it is not about a "trifle." Listen to what Jesus himself says in Matt. xii, 40: "For, as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth."

In this passage Jesus declares that it was not a great fish, but a whale, that swallowed Jonah, and that the prophet was inside of it, where he performed his private devotions, during the space of three days and three nights, thus adumbrating the burial of his own body in the earth during the space of three days and three nights. Now, Miss Ida, if Jesus, the model and the master of all Unitarian Christians, believed, as he evidently did, this statement of Jonah and the whale, why cannot you, the disciple of such a master, believe it too? To be sure the master seems to hav been as ignorant of natural history as Solomon, for he did not know that it was impossible for a whale to swallow a man; and if it was a natural impossibility, then what becomes of the typical analogy between Jonah's apparent death and burial in the belly of the whale, and his own death and burial in the earth, and his ultimate resurrection from the tomb at Jerusalem? One of the illustrious fathers of the church who lived in the third century—Tertullian—adopted it as a principle or rule of mental conduct: "Credo, quia impossibile est." That is: I believe the proposition presented to my mind, because it is impossible to be true. That is, to say again: The more mountainous the absurdity and falsehood of the proposition the more easily can I believe it; for that is Paul's definition of faith—"the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen." That is the reason he so glorifies faith, because it can swallow whales or anything else, provided it be stupendous in size. But now let us come to the New Testament.

4. Do you believe, Miss Ida, in the doctrin of eternal hell-fire as the fate of all those who do not believe in Jesus Christ as a divine savior?

No, indeed. I do not believe in such a doctrin because I cannot. I regard its teaching as a foul slander upon the character of our heavenly father, who looks with an equal eye of compassion upon all his children of the human family. I agree with Lord Bacon when he says that it is better to believe in no God at all than a God who will kindle up the fires of hell to perpetually consume his own children whom he has made so sensitiv to pain.

5. But, Miss Ida, you will not deny that, if the Evangelists are to be trusted as truth-tellers, Jesus plainly taught this doctrin, as well as did his Apostles. Besides this, the truth of it is what the old theologians called the "procuring cause" of the whole expensiv machinery of redemption. If there is no eternal hell-fire to be delivered from, where was the necessity and use of Jesus dying on the cross? If there is no undying worm to gnaw upon the sinner's soul, and no unquenchable fire to consume his happiness, what folly to erect such a colossal institution as the church, which rests its claim to existence on this assumption alone? The church spends millions every year in building and keeping up meeting-houses, and paying their ministers, and for sending the gospel to the heathen. In consideration of such services the states of this Union, although they are all corporations without souls, exempt the churches from paying taxes on their property, which amounts in value to many millions of money.

But at this point I must be specially careful of my speech, lest I slander the brethren. Therefore, I say, if there is really no hell of fire and brimstone in the other world, into which all will be cast, unless they join the church and prove their sincerity by giving their money freely to carry out her schemes; if hell is no reality, but a mere bugaboo invented thousands of years ago by the priesthood to frighten the ignorant masses into abject submission to its will; then, according to the last census, there are in the United States some scores of thousands of the clergy who are open to the charge of raising millions of money every year under false pretenses! They are either extremely ignorant, and know no better, or they are systematically imposing on the credulity of their fellow-citizens, and filching of them their money, by making them believe, as a fundamental religious dogma, that which is a fundamental lie, and which they themselvs secretly believe to be such. For precisely what the key-stone is to the arch, locking and binding all the other stones together, and making them one system, the doctrin of hell, as laid down by Jesus and his Apostles, is to all the rest of the doctrins of religion. Knock out this key-stone, or dissolve it by the chemistry of Freethought and unbelief, and every one of them—trinity, divinity of Christ, immaculate conception either of Mary or of Jesus, regeneration by the Holy Ghost, election and perseverance of wicked saints; and the superstructure—the church, the ministry, holy days, and rites and ceremonies, would all come tumbling down and resemble the ruins of a great city after it had been shaken with an earthquake that did not leave one stone upon another.

Well, I confess I see with the eye of my intellect the absolute necessity of the doctrin of eternal hell-fire in a system of theology, but my heart rebels against the doctrin, and I must still keep my place in the ranks of those who dissent from it.

6. What do you think, Miss Ida, of the decree of election and reprobation, whereby a comparativly small portion of mankind are chosen to eternal life and happiness after death, and the larger part are sentenced to eternal damnation, including infants?

Lord! when you ask me this question you introduce me into a chamber of horrors. I feel as I did in my childhood when I read of the deeds done in the Catholic Inquisition, and how the rack, the thumb-screws, and all the other diabolical machines of torture were used in the name, and by the authority, of religion. This is Calvinism, the belief of the man who burnt Servetus to death simply because he was a Unitarian, born before his time. Calvin's God was the monster who kindled up the sulphurous fires of hell to torture his own children. The idea that our heavenly father could be the author of a decree which, clearly, up to the present time has been peopling hell and unpeopling heaven! I answer No, I cannot believe it. The best feelings of the nature God has given me, cry out against such a doctrin; and I do not wonder that the Presbyterians are trying to eliminate it from their Confession of Faith, root and branch.

7. I am glad to see, Miss Ida, this burst of holy indignation at the decree of election and reprobation. Women are made of finer clay than man, and it is not strange that you, who are so good a specimen of your sex, should use the terrible words of denunciation you do. But with my sense of justice and fair play, I cannot allow you to make John Calvin a scapegoat for the Apostle Paul. In his "Institutions of the Christian Religion," chapter 23, section 7, where he discusses the subject of the decree of election, reprobation, and the damnation of infants, Calvin says—for he wrote in Latin—: "Decretum quidem horribile, fateor," which, being interpreted, is: "It is a horrible decree, I confess," but immediately he silences his own, and all other men's, objections to the doctrin by quoting, as absolute authority for its truth, the inspired words of the Apostle Paul in the eighth and ninth chapters of his Epistles to the Romans. The idea of the damnation of an infant to eternal hell-fire before it was born causes the hearts of all the rest of the woman world, as well as yours, to shudder with cold fear at the unmercifulness of it. But Paul says, in Romans ix, 11, that this was the case with the reprobate Esau, who all through his life was a much more honorable and just man than his elect brother

Jacob. Look at the words: "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand, not of works, but of him who calleth, it was said unto her, . . . Jacob hav I loved, and Esau hav I hated."

Could human language express a proposition more plainly? But, if the Christian God exist at all, and created all things out of nothing, then he must be the sovereign disposer of all the men and things he brought into existence; for, it will not be disputed, when a man even, makes a thing by his power and skill, the absolute ownership of that thing is in him, and he has an unquestionable right to do with it as he pleases, either to smash it into pieces, or, to utilize it. So, God, being creator, is an absolute sovereign, and the lapse of time merely and gradually unfolds the plan, and brings to pass all things as they are set in order, by the counsel of his own will.

Now, according to the program, we see the earth filled with sin and misery. Being all-powerful, if some devil had secretly introduced sin into the world he had made so lovely, and so good, God was able to drive it out. If he was a merciful father to his unfortunate and unhappy children, why has he not, long before this, exercised his omnipotence, and rid the world of the curse? Is it not plain to the comprehension of a child that this world, so full of ignorance, crime, and sorrow, is the very one, out of the whole list of possible worlds, that God, as a sovereign, chose in order to glorify the attribute of his justice, by sending the overwhelming majority of mankind to suffer the agonies of hell-fire forever, and the little handful of the redeemed to glorify his fatherly goodness in a happy heaven? If, then, God hardens the heart of the criminal, as he did that of Pharaoh; if he throws temptations in his way so as to develop the cruel disposition he gave him, how can he complain of the workmanship of his own hand? Listen, and let the whole Christian world listen, to the summary way in which Paul meets this difficulty: "Nay, but, oh, man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it: Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?"

Now, Miss Ida, summon up your courage for the occasion. Don't imitate the Methodists, and the heretical Presbyterians, who skulk like cowards into the dark, after they acknowledge the plenary inspiration of Paul, but face the music of the facts. And especially, do not, like these men, pile up your denunciations upon the name and theology of Calvin, for he never originated one of the doctrins of the system which goes by his name, and is embodied in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. He got them all, verbatim literatim, et punctuatim, from the writings of the Apostle Paul. And if you grant as true Paul's conception of God, as the creator and sovereign of the universe, and this conception as the starting-point of his theology, no human intellect has ever been produced, or ever will be produced, that can detect the least flaw in any one of the links of iron that constitute the chain of his argument, and makes his system complete and consistent with itself. As a Freethinker I am pleased to see the terrible kicking that is going on among the clergy who are gradually getting their eyes open to the general subject, but, in the name of justice, let them kick against Paul and not against Calvin. Of all the so-called inspired writers, he stands at the head, in point of authority. Calvin's utterances are the mere echoes of his. Calvin was an honest man. His soul was not rotten with the gangrene of hypocrisy. He was a single-hearted and sincere man—sine cera, without wax to fill up the cracks in the integrity, or oneness, of his character, and make the world believe that he was what he was not. He never could hav taken the oath in the presence of "almighty God, the searcher of hearts," as Dr. Briggs did, that he sincerely believed, and based his hope of salvation from hell-fire upon, the truth of the Pauline theology, and in the very next breath, draw the dagger of Joab from beneath his skirt and stab it to the heart. I know exactly how Calvin felt on this subject, for I, too, once believed as he did, and never could hav escaped from the conclusion of the iron-linked argument of Paul, until I placed the New Testament itself on the level of all other books, whose merits, or demerits, were to be tested, not in the dark dungeons of implicit faith, but in the supreme court of the human understanding where Reason alone sits as judge.

It is not hard to see why the heretical clergy in the churches practice such deception as they do. Infidelity is yet unpopular. Being only human, and compelled to liv, not miraculously, on quails and manna, and water from the smitten rock, as the Israelites did in the wilderness, but on solid bread and butter, with the et ceteras produced by the farmers, they do not dare to denounce Paul, for that would prepare the way toward proceedings in the courts of law to oust them from their places and emoluments, on the charge of being open Infidels; and so they heap up their anathemas upon Calvin, a man whose character was more nearly conformed to the attributes of the Bible God than that of any other man in the history of the church, and who, believing with all his heart that Paul was the mouthpiece of the revealed God, accepted all his utterances as divine.

8. But I hav one more question to ask of you, Miss Ida. Do you believe in the unity and tri-personality of the Godhead, the absolute divinity and eternal sonship of Christ, and the equality of the Holy Ghost with the Father and the Son?

Oh, Lord! no; my dear sir, I believe in the multiplication table, and that three times one make three, and not one. As to the eternal sonship of Christ, I cannot believe it any more than Servetus did, because it clearly implies that a son can be as old as his father. The whole doctrin of the trinity, as laid down by Athanasius, and in the creed of the Church of England, is an intellectual muddle, making the Holy Ghost, who is a member of the trinity, to "proceed" from, or to be born of, the father and the son, whereas the Holy Ghost himself was one of the parents of Jesus, the eternal son, the Virgin Mary being his mother. My intellect will not allow me to accept doctrins which are absurd, and, therefore, impossible to be true.

9. Well, Miss Ida, the questions I hav asked you, by a consensus of the competent, running down all the ages from the times of the Apostles, hav been answered in the affirmativ. The Evangelist John, in the first verse of his gospel, is in haste to declare of Jesus, under the name of the "Word," as follows: "In the beginning"—that is, the beginning of time, or from all eternity—"was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the father, full of grace and truth." Here Jesus is set down as coexisting from eternity with the father, and as entitled to the glory of having created the universe. The passage could be corroborated by other citations from the New Testament, but as a proposition once proved to be true cannot be made more so by additional proof, I decline making any more quotations of scripture.

Besides, and especially, this very arrangement of the tri-personality of the godhead, and the respectiv functions of the three persons in the scheme of salvation, finds its procuring cause in the fundamental doctrin of Christianity that the human race is under the wrath and curse of God, and exposed to eternal perdition; so that, if there had been no hell and no exposure to its eternal fires, there would hav been no necessity for a triune God at all. The world could hav got along with one God. But the case of the "fall" was such that, if any of the human race were to be saved, the law that was violated by Adam's transgression in the garden of Eden, he representing in that transaction all his race—it was necessary that this law should be vindicated, and the law-giver too; and, therefore, an atonement must be made by a substitute. To meet this emergency, God the father sends the son on this errand. God the son accepts the mission, assumes human nature with the divine, and suffers death in the stead of those whom God the father had determined to save. The atonement, made by a mere man, would hav no merit, for, even if he had no sins of his own to atone for, he could not pay the debt due from all the rest of the guilty, and therefore he must be a God-man, his divinity giving the necessary value to his sufferings, and being the altar which sanctified the sacrifice laid upon it. Then, after the redemption has been purchased, the function of the Holy Ghost, under the emblem of a dove that could fly, is to hunt up the redeemed all over the earth, and prepare them for heaven by the instrumentality of the ministry and the means of grace.

10. Now, Miss Ida, if you do not believe any of these doctrins which I hav cited, and shown to be of the very essence of Pauline Christianity, please tell me what you do believe.

Oh! I believe in Unitarianism. Jesus is my master; and you must not insult my feelings by applying to me that hateful epithet of Infidel, for I am not an Infidel.

11. But, Miss Ida, like all other Unitarians, you reject in detail every one of the doctrins of the New Testament that cluster around the name of Jesus, and giv him the only distinction he has over all other men, as the savior of sinners, dying for them, and thus saving them from hell, by his atoning blood. You do not feel yourself to be a foul and totally depraved sinner, needing to be washed in the fountain of his blood, to be fitted for heaven when you die. How then can you call him master and lord, when you neither believe what he taught, nor do what he commands? A strange kind of a "disciple" that, whose only sign of discipleship is in crying, Hail, master!

I cannot see any difference between your religious opinions, as expressed in this dialog, and those held by Thomas Paine. Paine believed in the existence of a God, and in the immortality of the human soul. So do you. But he did not believe, he positivly disbelieved, that our Bible was a plenarily inspired revelation from heaven, and that the Christian religion was the substance of that revelation. Neither do you. Were he now on earth, and bore the reputable character he did when he was here, there is not a Unitarian church in the country that would not open its arms joyfully to receive him into its membership, provided, he would be inconsistent, not to say hypocritical, enough to call Jesus master.

Do not take offense, Miss Ida, at my thus associating your name with that of the author of "The Age of Reason." During the greater part of the last hundred years, the Christian church, by its incessant and cowardly vituperation of the man, has been exemplifying the fable of the Ass Kicking the Dead Lion. But it seems to be a law of the heavens that the stars rise and set; and while the star of Thomas Paine, emerging from the thick darkness of the past, has risen above the horizon and shines in its nativ splendor, the luminary of the church has left its zenith long ago, and is slowly, but inevitably, sinking down into the night of the west.

Here endeth our catechetical exercise.

Is not Miss Craddock an Infidel?

About a century has elapsed since the Unitarians of New England seceded from the orthodox church, organized themselvs into a body, and took the name they now bear. Their new creed being a series of mere negations, exactly as long as the list of affirmations in the orthodox Confession of Faith, led their brethren to say, and with perfect truth and appropriateness, that Unitarianism was nothing in the world but baptized Infidelity. Hence, they refused, and I expect, still refuse, to hold religious communion with them any more than they would with Deists and Mohammedans. The Unitarians call themselvs "Liberal Christians," and their liberality was so unstinted that they gave away every one of the evangelical doctrins, retaining nothing but the courtesy of calling Jesus master, and sometimes kissing him, in token of loyalty. When compared with the larger sects of Christendom, some of whom number their churches and clergy by thousands, Unitarianism is a very small body; but it has a voracious appetite. If I mistake not, the Boston Banner of Light has charged it with a hankering desire to swallow down the Spiritualists, who are a very large, but unorganized body. It made the attempt at Philadelphia last October, and under the auspices of our late president and secretary, to re-enact the performance of the whale and Jonah, with the class of Freethinkers in the United States represented by the Secular Union. But the Secularists, being sincere Infidels, and suspicious that there would not be congenial and comfortable quarters in the belly of so small a whale, declined accepting the invitation to go in, and are still at large contemplating their present situation.

No. When a man is in the church who has a logical mind, and loves truth better than anything else, and knows enough to suspect that he occupies a false position, he begins the work of investigation in earnest, and without regard to consequences. He moves cautiously toward the light, taking no step until he has examined the ground upon which he is going to set his foot. The sign-boards over the doors of the two wayside inns—Unitarianism and Universalism—inviting him to come in and accept their good cheer, and feel at home, hav no attraction for him, and he hastens on, never ceasing to investigate until he repudiates the whole mass of superstitious feelings, thoughts, and ceremonies of worship, which constitute religion, and accepts Reason as the master of his soul. Then he experiences the meaning of that blessed word rest, and is compensated by the satisfaction it imparts for all the toil and sacrifice he has endured in order to reach that condition.

The Paine Anniversary.

The Manhattan Liberal Club covered itself with credit in its celebration of the 155th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. In this it was helped along materially by the fact that two of the most distinguished Freethinkers are residents of New York, and consented to speak on the occasion. And further, that in Dr. Ned Foote the club has a business manager who knows how to manage. The arrangements were complete and happy.

Chickering Hall was crowded to the doors, and one acquainted with the Liberals of the city could count hundreds of friends in the audience. On the platform was a large picture of Paine, one of two painted by Jarvis, loaned for this occasion by J. H. Johnson. The other is in the possession of Mr. Conway, and is being used for the engraving in his new Life of Paine. These pictures, said Mr. Wakeman, are a revelation; the Life will be a resurrection. At the organ Mr. W. Corey produced harmonious sounds. Wilson McDonald, who is the presiding officer this month for the club, called attention to the organization, saying that over seven hundred lectures—with about four million criticisms thereon—had been delivered before it, and that it was the club's usual custom to celebrate the anniversary of Paine's advent on this troubled sphere. Mr. Wakeman explained about the pictures. At Colonel Ingersoll's entrance the greeting was so effusiv that he bowed a few times as a hint to the audience to be quiet and hear Mr. Conway.

Mr. Conway's address was a review of Paine's life, and the splendid work he did for political and religious freedom. The facts he presented, it is known, he has dug out with laborious skill, and will be given fully in his new work. He has found that Paine was the first Abolitionist in America. He wrote the first emancipation proclamation—that of Pennsylvania. He first proposed arbitration to take the place of war. He first explained how steam could be used for navigating boats. He invented the first iron bridge. He wrote his "Age of Reason" twice. The first time it was suppressed. He completed it the second time the evening before he was put into prison in France. Paine, Mr. Conway said, was hitting at an altogether different God from that Christians worship now. He was hitting at a God of terror and revenge, and of everything except love. He hit so hard and his hits were so unanswerable, that it came to pass before he died that either Jehovah or Paine had to recant. Paine wouldn't, and so Jehovah did. He has recanted hell-fire, predestination, and total depravity, and is still recanting.

Mr. Conway's recital of the facts in Paine's life, given in an easy and eloquent manner, well prepared the way for the tribute which followed. The applause for Mr. Conway almost blended with the noisy greeting to Colonel Ingersoll when the chairman perfunctorily introduced him who needed no introduction. Colonel Ingersoll said:

Mr. Chairman—Ladies and Gentlemen: It is not simply a duty, but it is a privilege to help rescue the reputation of a great and noble man from the slanders of ignorance and hypocrisy. [Applause.] We have listened to a very noble eulogium upon Thomas Paine, and the reason it was so noble is that it is true. We have been told what he did; something of what he accomplished in this world, and a little of what he suffered. We must remember that for many, many ages, mankind was governed by two ideas: one, that all power to govern came from the clouds—came from some King of Kings, and that all who ruled occupied their thrones because it was the will of him who sat in sovereignty above all. This was the belief; and this power from on high, coming to the king, going on down from him to the lowest one in authority, finally reached the poor, wretched peasants. Thus it was for many, many generations, and the result of it was that the many toiled in vain, with little to eat and with little to wear, living in huts and dens, that the few might live in idleness—might be clad in robes of purple. That was the scheme of the divine government, believed in by our ancestors—honestly believed in, at least, by those who submitted; and they were to be rewarded for all the pains suffered in this world by having harps when they should go to another. [Laughter and applause.] And they consoled themselves with the thought: While the kings and the queens and the lords and the ladies have their good times here, we will have our good times after we die; and possibly we will have the happiness of seeing all these ladies and gentlemen in hell. [Laughter.] The latter reflection undoubtedly was a great consolation. [Laughter.]

That, I say, was the first idea; but the man of whom you have heard so much, which has been so well said, took the other ground, and said, "This power to govern does not come from God. God must be retired from politics. [Laughter and applause.] This power to govern comes from the consent of the governed. The basis of this authority must be the people themselves." [Applause.] Well, nothing could be more laughable at that time than the idea of having a government administered by shoemakers, and carpenters, and farmers, and simple buyers and sellers, and traders. It was thought impossible that such people should have brain enough to really administer a government. This governing power—this governing sense—was confined to the few—the few that had been chosen by the King of Kings; but finally, through the efforts of Thomas Paine, more than through the efforts of any other man who ever trod the western world [applause]—that experiment was tried here on our soil; and the question was, whether ordinary human beings, with ordinary intelligence, even though they were mechanics and farmers and merchants—and lawyers [laughter]—whether they had the sense and the honesty to form a government, and patriotism enough to administer it. It was tried here; and I need not say it has been an amazing success. [Applause.] In all these other governments the church and state existed together. They were united. But a few people in the days of Thomas Paine said, "Let us separate church and state;" and our forefathers agreed to it. Very few, however, were in favor of it. And I will tell you to-night the reason they agreed to it. A few, like Thomas Paine, like Benjamin Franklin, like Thomas Jefferson—a few knew there should be no such marriage. But the question came up before the many—the average multitude—and then the question took a different form. It was not with them, Shall there be a church and state?—but, Shall it be our church? [Applause.] The Puritans would have had their church united to the state, if they had had the power; the Episcopalians the same; and so of every sect in the thirteen colonies. But there is a little human nature even in a church [laughter]; and a church that could not be the bride, was willing the state should remain a bachelor, rather than marry a rival. [Great laughter and applause.] In that way, and in that way only, we got rid of the church in this country. Now then, that was the first great step. Political power does not come from God; or if there be an infinite being, he allows human beings to govern themselves. He refused longer to be accountable for the blunders of any administration [laughter and applause]; and that was an excellent thing for him too. [Renewed laughter.] So, since that time, in this country, and in some other lands, the people have endeavored to manage their own affairs, without the interference of any gentleman pretending to be the agent of some power above the clouds. [Laughter and applause.] That was the first step.

Then there is another thing. For many, many generations, it has been believed—is believed by a great many good people to-night—that religion comes from the clouds. We have now got to the point that we know that political power comes from the people, and that every government should rest on the consent of the governed. We know that. We have found out that the people themselves make and create and administer better government than they ever got from the clouds. [Applause.] I say, then, the belief was that religion came from that same country; and that if some being, somewhere in the midst of the constellations, had not written some Ten Commandments, we would never have known right from wrong. Now, it has always seemed to me—and I think I can make it clear to you—that no such information was necessary. In this world, for a great many years people have had to work to get an honest living; and wherever man has worked to get an honest living, he has always objected to some fellow who did not work taking the result of his labors. [Applause.] If a man that planted a few acres of potatoes, and hoed them all summer, and dug them in the fall, and picked them up—using his own back [laughter]—it never would have occurred to him that a gentleman who had sat on the fence and watched him—I say, it would never have occurred to him that that fence-sitter, even if no Ten Commandments had ever been given, had a better right to the potatoes than the man who raised them. [Laughter and applause.] So, it seems to me that in every country where the people, or a majority of the people, objected to being murdered, there would probably have been a law against murder, whether they had ever heard from Mount Sinai or not. And so we might go through the Decalogue.

I say, then, we had to take another step and that was that religion does not come from the clouds. Religion comes from the heart of man. [Applause.] Human affection is the foundation of all that is holy in religion. Human intelligence, applied to human conduct, is what we call morality; and you add to simple morality kindness, charity, love—and there can be no more perfect religion imagined by the brain of man. [Great applause.] Now, then, as we succeeded so well in politics, by getting out of our minds the idea that power and authority came from beyond the stars, so I hope that we shall make the greatest possible advance in religion, when we get it out of our minds that religion comes from another world than this. There is no religion except humanity. There cannot be. Those clouds called creeds are destined all to fade away, but the sky will remain—humanity; and in the sky will shine the constellations of human virtues. In other words, we want to outgrow the supernatural in these affairs. Thomas Paine helped take the first great step. He dug down under the throne, searching for the bed-rock, and he found nothing but lies, mistakes, assumptions—everything that is infamous. And when he got through with that work, it occurred to him, one day, to dig under the altar and see what was there; and it was worse there than under the throne. [Laughter and applause.] Now, Thomas Paine was not what would be called to-day much of an Infidel. I think he would cut me dead. [Great laughter.] If he were alive to-night, he would be off with the Unitarians—and with the conservative wing of the Unitarians. That is to say, he believed absolutely in the existence of an infinite God; and in some way he excused that God for making this world—for giving power to the Catholic church. How he did it, I don't know; but he did it. In some way, he excused that deity for all the volcanoes and plagues and famines of the world. How, I don't know; but he did. And he may be right. I am not saying that he was wrong. All I am saying is that I do not believe he was right. As I have said a hundred times, you have no idea how little I know on this subject [laughter]; and you never will know how little I know until you appreciate the state of your own knowledge. [Great laughter.] Paine, I say, not only believed in it, but he believed in a special providence, exactly as Mr. Conway has told you. Well, so did Voltaire; he wrote essay after essay, not simply to prove the existence of God, but that he in some way ruled this world. Well, I don't deny it; but there are two facts inconsistent in my mind—that is to say, one fact is inconsistent with the alleged fact. I cannot harmonize God and Siberia. Still, I don't say that I know; because you know that I don't, and I know that I don't. [Laughter.] But Paine wanted to do one thing. He wanted, in religion, to get rid of middlemen. [Laughter.] He wanted the citizens of the United States to transact what little business they might have with the deity, without paying any commissions to gentlemen who were in the guessing business for a living. [Laughter.] And whoever steps between a priest and his salary will find that he has committed all the crimes in the statutes; and if he does not find it out, others will find it out—when he is dead. That is all he tried to do. He taught pure morality. He taught that we should worship God simply by expressing and feeling our gratitude, and that gratitude should rise from the heart for favors received, like perfume from a flower; that there need be no form, no ceremony, no costly cathedrals for this business—no hired clergy; that man could worship God for himself. [Applause.] Then he made enemies. Then they began to look, as Mr. Conway has said, for special providence. And I remember, when there was something the matter with my throat, I got a letter from a Presbyterian minister, who took the pains to tell me that he had read in a paper that I had cancer of the throat; he then called my attention to the fact that it was probably a judgment of God for the blasphemies I had uttered. And I wrote back to him, good-naturedly—I always feel that way toward clergymen [laughter]; I hav the feeling that they are doing the best they know. So I wrote back to him that I shouldn't wonder if he were right; and if it turned out that it was the judgment of God, I should never blame him—never [laughter]; that if I were in God's place, probably, I should kill any man that I could not answer. [Laughter and applause.] In justice to that man, I suppose I ought to add that he wrote me another letter taking the first one all back. But such was the belief; and if the church could hav answered the "Age of Reason," it would have satisfied itself simply by attacking the book—that would have been enough. It was because it could not answer the book that it attacked the man. [Applause.] And that is what the church has always done. I do not say it has been dishonest. I don't know how it will account for its acts. But it has always done that way. And there is something to me remarkable in the constitution of a religious falsehood. What health it has! How hard it is to kill! After you think it is dead, the roses of health will bloom in its cheeks again. [Laughter.] It will lie in a comatose condition, like a frozen serpent, and all at once, in the sunshine of opportunity, it crawls. It will lie hidden for years, waiting for the mouth of resurrection—waiting for lips, that it may be born once again. And it is always born again [laughter], yes, sir. I have never known a religious lie to die. Only the other day, in a paper in this city, appeared the old story that when Thomas Paine died he was in agony and terror; that he called upon Christ to have pity upon his soul; that he confessed to some girl that the devil must have had a hand in writing the "Age of Reason:" that he wished the books had all been burned. Now, that was told only the other day; written—published—by a minister of the gospel—one who has been duly ordained [laughter]; and I have no doubt he believes every word of it—undoubtedly he believes it, because he wants it that way. [Laughter and applause.] But the facts are exactly the other way. And is it not wonderful that all these gentlemen rely so much on what they call the evidence of death? Hundreds of murderers die in this country on the gallows without a quiver—with the utmost courage; and I have never known one of those deaths to be quoted in favor of murder—never; and yet it would be just as sensible. A man goes to the stake and dies for his opinion. That is not the slightest evidence that his opinion was correct. It simply demonstrates the sincerity of the man and the courage of his heart—not the correctness of his opinion. And if every Christian in the world was frightened at death when he dies, it would not tend to prove the truth of any miracle in the Bible or the falsity of any miracle in the Bible. The thing is not evidence in that case. So the same story was told of Voltaire in the same paper here the other day—that he had died in the utmost terror. Now, it has been denied—not only that, but it has been demonstrated a thousand times—that it is utterly false. But it will come up again next spring [laughter] along with the grass. [Renewed laughter.] The intelligent ministers, however, won't use it—that is, not when they are preaching in their own pulpit; if they go out in the country they may. [Laughter.] And it is a very curious thing the way that is done. When a thing gets too idiotic to be preached in the pulpit it is handed down to the Sunday-school superintendent and taught to the children. [Laughter.] When it is too absurd for the children we giv it to the missionaries [great laughter and applause], or send it down South for the colored brethren. In other words, we do with our theories—with our religions—as we do with our clothes; when they get out at the elbows and knees, and when we cannot get them cleaned and revamped, or mended, to look decent, why, then, we have charity enough to give them to some other fellow. So we find the religious teachings of the day charitably distributed—going from the highest, as they call themselves, down, down, down, until they strike those who for the first time hear "glad tidings of great joy." [Laughter.]

Now, all that Thomas Paine endeavored to do—and it seems like a small matter—was to make this world fit to live in. That is what he was trying to do. He was trying to keep the organized few from living upon the agony and toil of the unorganized many. [Applause.] He did his very best to exalt in the bosom of every man his idea of the dignity of man—his idea of the value of liberty and opportunity—his idea of culture, of education; raising, day by day, the standard of human endeavor. That is what he tried to do. He tried to change kings and lords and dukes into the servants of the sovereign people. [Applause.] That is what he endeavored to do. And in the world of religion he tried to do, if possible, still more. In the one case he wished to preserve the individual rights of the man by the preservation of a republican government—of real, pure democracy, as nearly pure in form as the number of people would permit. But in the world of religion he knew that each man was a sovereign; that in that world there should be no government except the government of reason, of persuasion, of logic. He knew that in the world of thought each brain should wear the crown and tiara of sovereignty and the robe of purple. He knew that in that world only the man was a good citizen who gave every right that he claimed for himself to every other human being. [Applause.] He also knew that in that great republic of mind only those were traitors who resorted to brute force. And so Thomas Paine said, "Let every man think for himself; let him have his own idea of the divine being; let him worship as his heart prompts." Upon that subject he said as great a thing as man has ever said: "When you say that man shall only worship God in one way, by that law you say that God shall receive worship only in one way." [Applause.] No greater utterance ever fell from lips upon that subject than that. You have no right, if there be a God, to say what worship he shall receive; and Thomas Paine said, "If there be a God, his heart goes out to all his children in this world, and consequently it is his will that they should all be free; that they should all be happy." And all I contend for in this world is that every man is entitled to the work of his hands; every man is entitled to the harvest of his acre; and it is the duty of every man to give his honest thought to every being who has the right to ask it. That is all. That is all. That is all the religion we need in this world, or any other. And if there be another—and everybody who is now living wishes to keep on living. Hope is not based on evidence. There is a vast deal of hope where there is no evidence. There has been a good deal of hope when the evidence was the other way on a great many questions in this world. And I suppose it can truthfully be said that hope is the only universal liar who never loses his reputation for veracity. Hope always tells a good story—always paints on the canvas of the future a beautiful picture. And I would do nothing by word or act—I would do nothing in any way—to take from the sky the smallest hope that ever shed a ray of light in the human heart [applause]; not one. If this universe only could be as I wish it were—and maybe it is—I would like to know—nothing could fill me with greater joy than to know that for every sorrow suffered here there is to be a joy somewhere. Nothing would give me greater delight than to know that every tear that sorrow has ever shed will at last become prismatic, and that we will see the beautiful bow upon the dark cloud of death. Nothing would give me greater joy than to know that there is some world where innocence will always be a perfect shield—some world where justice will triumph—some world where truth can enter the ring naked and conquer all comers—some world in which the good man cannot be slandered and maligned—some world in which every heart can be known as it absolutely is. [Great applause.] And if there be such a world, in its shining streets, or by its winding streams of joy, you will never meet a grander soul, a braver soul, than once inhabited the clay of Thomas Paine. [Great applause.]

And so I say, let us do what we can to destroy the phantoms of ignorance and superstition. Let us do what we can to take from the heart these weeds and thorns; and let us be happy here, and be happy here by making others so. Let us enjoy to-day without regretting having lost yesterday, and without fearing that we may lose to-morrow. [Applause.] Let us enjoy this green strip of flowering earth, called the present, stretching between the two great eternal deserts—the past and the future. Let us enjoy that strip of verdure. Let us enjoy the flowers that bloom upon it. And if there be another world, I will be just as happy when we get there as any fellow in this world or in that; and if there be no such, we will have enjoyed this. [Applause.] While I live, I want to be free. That is what Thomas Paine wanted to be—not only free, but he wanted to be free to do good; because the more liberty you have, the more obligation there is upon you.

And this man (I can hardly stop speaking about him), said another thing: "Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child, cannot be a true system." [Applause.] Nothing was ever said better than that. And this same man made a creed for himself: "The world is my country; to do good my religion." That man was brave enough to write and fight for liberty here—brave enough in the shadow of the guillotine, to say in the French Chamber, "Let us destroy monarchy, not the man"—great enough to say, "It was his misfortune to be a king." I want you just to think of the diameter and of the circumference of that splendid expression, made under those circumstances. I want you to see just how splendid and noble this man was; and then I want you to know that all the men who have ever maligned and slandered him, from that day to this, compared with him are vermin. [Applause.] And yet I don't blame them; they have done the best they know. It is our duty to tell them who Thomas Paine was. That man, after having done all that he did, received nothing from the United States, for many, many years, except scorn—derision — contempt — falsehood — slander. And the church has been like a coiled viper on the grave of Thomas Paine since 1809—like a coiled viper; and whoever has attempted to defend him, it has attacked.

There is another little thing connected with this—and I am going to say a word about myself. The first speech I ever made in public was an address at a Sunday-school celebration, when the other man didn't come; and in that speech I defended the memory of Thomas Paine. [Applause.] I made use of the first chance I had. [Laughter.] I am the friend of every human being who has been the friend of man — no matter where he lived — in what age or time. Every man who has lifted his voice for human rights—I am his friend. [Applause.] Every man who has defended freedom of thought, I am his admirer to-night. And every man who has endeavored to enslave his fellows, and every man who has persecuted his fellow-men, I hate with all my heart and soul; and yet, if they were alive, the only injury I would do them would be to enlighten them. [Applause.] What would the world have been without these men?—without such men as Voltaire, one of the noblest men who ever lived [applause], and whose name I never see and never repeat without a thrill—never. I think of a soldier, with a plume over his helmet, riding to a walled city, demanding surrender; and I see the hosts of superstition on the beleaguered walls, and I see them with a white flag in their trembling hands. Voltaire—Thomas Paine—take the two, and they did more for human liberty than any other two men who ever lived and died. [Applause.]

Now, all I want is for you to know the truth—and in a little while it will be published—about Thomas Paine; and after that book has been published by Mr. Conway, and sufficient time has elapsed for intelligent people to read it, and then any occupant of a pulpit tells the old lies again, I intend to hold him responsible—at least, by calling his attention to the fact; and I want everyone who hears me to-night to make up his and her mind—especially her mind [laughter]—that from this night forth you will always have the womanhood and the manhood to defend the memory of the friend of man, Thomas Paine. [Long-continued applause.]

Parsons Losing Their Cunning.

It seems that the clergy hav not quite enough dissension and discord among themselvs to keep them from meddling with R. G. Ingersoll and his like. They are getting reckless. To bring out publicly their old theological scarecrow weapons against modern science and reason, shows a lack of prudence. Instead of closing the breach already made in their celestial fort, more than ever before will reason and Freethought now enter.

The parsons seem to be demoralized. Some of them affirm that Ingersoll has said nothing new; that his assertions are all old and hav been refuted over and over again. Then why be disturbed now? Others concede that much of his "Christmas Sermon" is truthful, but think it is for that reason the more dangerous. Agreed. And others ask, who or what he means by the term orthodox, in face of the different creeds and numerous sects. To be orthodox is to be sound in the prevailing or established religious doctrins of one's country. No one will question the orthodoxy of Dr. John Hall, or the pastors of the Dutch Reformed churches on Fifth avenue.

A canon of the Dutch Reformed church declares that "not all, but some only, are elected to salvation; while others are passed by in the eternal decree, permitting them to follow their own ways, at last for the declaration of his (God's) justice to condemn and punish them forever." A section of the Westminster Confession of Faith says, after dealing with the elect, that "the rest of mankind God was pleased to pass by and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath." And the gospel accords thus: St. Matthew tells us that the celestial king at the judgment, after rewarding those on his right hand, will say to those on his left, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire; these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." And St. John heard a voice saying, "If any man worship the beast, and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." Now, with the support of these pious and inspired authorities, why should the ordained clergy fear or take notice of any criticism flowing from carnal human reason? Hav they lost confidence in their God?

The substance of orthodoxy at this time is the belief in Jesus as a savior God, and in an endless future state of rewards and punishments. Before long it may be condensed to solely a belief in a heaven for the redeemed and an eternal hell for the rest of mankind.

Thinks It a Healthy Tonic.

Jan. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say that I consider your paper excellent, beautiful, and surpassing any, for the new year, and I consider it a healthy tonic for any person.

Your truth seeker,
PHILIP H. ROSENTHAL.

"A Nice New Year Gift."

CARROLL, IA., Jan. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4 for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Bible Picture Book. THE TRUTH SEEKER, dressed in its stylish new suit, arrived and was welcomed warmly this morning—a nice New Year gift. A. S. GOCKLEY.

We Will Try to Deserve It.

MISSOULA, MONT., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I must say a word in praise of the new dress of the paper. It looks fine and is a paper the Freethinkers of America should be proud of.

I would recommend Miss Susan H. Wixon's "Story Hour" for children as being as nearly perfect as a book could be for a Freethinker to put into the hands of his child. A. M. STEVENS.

The Medicin Men Call Him Bad Medicin.

AVONDALE, ALA., Jan. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your paper now about two months, and am having more fun than a mule can draw. It makes a shaking up of the dry bones. The "sky-pilots" kick and squeal, call me Infidel and bad medicin; yet they read the paper, and it is hard work to keep a copy in the house. Count on me to keep the ball rolling in our little town, and I am not alone. There are a number here on the right track.

Yours ever, J. H. LANE.

A Freethought Picture Gallery.

PARAGON HOTEL,
REDDING, CAL., Dec. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I like the papers very much, and my guests like to read them. I am making a picture gallery of the pictures in the hotel office, where they are seen by hundreds of people. I find nineteen out of every twenty persons that I meet here in California are unbelievers in Bible dogmas and creeds. If you will send me some back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I think I can secure a good many subscribers.

Yours respectfully, GEORGE GRAVES.

Strangers Must Not Lie Idle in Chicago Over Sunday.

BELOIT, O., Jan. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I like the style of the new TRUTH SEEKER concerning the World's Fair. There would be one advantage in having it open on Sunday that I hav not seen noticed, and that is, where people liv a long way off they would not need to pay any attention as to what day they left home so as not to lie a day on expense and see nothing. The most of the people only get to be there two or three or four days, and if one of these happens to be Sunday it is expensiv on poor people.

Yours for liberty, R. URMSON.

Truths Told in Santa Ana.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Jan. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: W. S. Bell, the genial gentleman and eloquent orator, has just finished a course of three lectures to the citizens of this city. The audiences, although not large, were very appreciativ, and enjoyed a rich intellectual treat in listening to Mr. Bell's highly entertaining and instructiv addresses. Mr. Bell should be kept busy, for we hav very few public speakers who can handle Freethought subjects in so intelligent and entertaining a manner. D. EDSON SMITH.

Eager For Lecturers.

OLYMPIA, WASH., Jan. 9, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a draft, also a kick from the one who is always willing to contribute something. Five years I hav lived in Tacoma, Wash., and in that time there hav been just two lecturers there, who delivered five lectures. One had a small hall a good way out; the other had a good hall, but beastly weather. The former was C. B. Reynolds; the latter was Remsburg. I kept both lecturers while in Tacoma and saw that all the bills were paid on both occasions. Why Mr. Reynolds does not do more nearer home I cannot see. The support is in Tacoma if in any city in the West. It only wants stirring up, and I wish some lecturer would take the field. You may publish as much of this letter for Mr. Reynolds's benefit as you wish, as I am sure he has neglected Tacoma. I hav made him offers of room and board on different occasions, but am not in Tacoma just at present and so could not help. I hav also offered Mr. Putnam the same offer when I met him at Victoria. I wish a Bible Picture Book just as soon as they are ready.

Respectfully, W. D. ROBERTSON.

Harries Preachers and Circulates Petitions.

LOS NIETOS, CAL., Dec. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me some of those printed letterheads to Congressmen on the World's Fair question. I would inclose something for the Literature Fund, but owing to a discussion that I am having with a couple of sky-pilots am rather short of cash just now. We started it through a local paper, but as I wanted to say much more on the subject than the editor could be expected to print in the paper I had it printed in circular form. By the way, what are your rates for printing anti-Godism matter? There were about twenty-two thousand ems in this circular and it cost me about $18.

I will soon send you a few hundred names petitioning for Sunday opening of the World's Fair. And of course you can count on my renewing my subscription, or rather subscribing for the first time. I am an old Freethought subscriber. I also want one of the Bible Picture Books. Is there any hurry about sending in those petitions for Sunday opening of the Fair? I am going to send them to you.

Yours truly, ELMER HOLLOWAY.

We Know Scripture Better Than Christians.

LEON, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I sent you $1 for the Bible Pictures, for which I hav your receipt. I intend to take your paper while I am able to read, which cannot be in the course of things very long, and I intend to pay promptly. I would be glad to do something to increase the circulation of your paper, and will do so if the chance ever comes.

One thing I hav noticed in reading your paper that has surprised me. That is the knowledge of and familiarity with the scriptures which some of your correspondents who claim to be Infidels show in their articles. It seems to me that your artist Heston and your correspondents Moss, Peck, Remsburg, and others hav a better knowledge of the descriptiv and historical portions of the Bible than is generally found among those who claim to be orthodox. Christians tell us that Infidelity and ignorance go hand in hand; that not one in ten of our modern Infidels has any correct knowledge of the principles of the scripture which he is trying to overthrow. I think if they were to read your paper a short time they would be convinced that such ideas are delusions; that Infidels hav a knowledge of the scriptural writings fully equal to what is generally found among the orthodox. E. C. DURFEE.

A Seventeen-Year Friend.

EAST PORTLAND, ORE., Jan. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4, $3 of which is for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $1 for the Biblical Pictures when ready. Dear sir, I would like to write you a long letter, but I am no writer. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any other paper. I think I hav been taking it for seventeen years.

Seven years ago my wife and I moved back to Canada, leaving some of my family to run the farm. We went to Clinton, Ont. While there I sent to Chas. Watts, of Toronto, to know what he would charge to come up to Clinton and giv two evenings' lectures. He sent back word, so much. I sent right back for him to state the time and come right away. Then I hired the town hall for two nights. He came and gave two fine lectures. A man opposed him; he knocked him out in the third round. Watts pointed his finger at him and turning to the audience said: "If this is the best preacher you people of Clinton hav I am sorry for you." It was the first Liberal lecture given there. I took it all on my own self. I got angry at so much boycotting and their old foolish twaddle called religion—"Believe our foolish dogmas or be damned." I wish all the TRUTH SEEKER family a happy new year. I am waiting and anxious to hear from Brother Peck. I like all the pictures. Giv the eighty thousand deadheads no rest. And above all, let us hav the World's Fair on Sunday.

Yours truly, HENRY BENNETT.

Running Jesus In Debt.

NAPLES, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1892.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Once in a while something takes place which is entirely too good to be lost. Blood's Depot, on the Erie railroad, is about six miles from our village. We hav quite a sprinkling of Germans in our community, and recently one of them gave a man some money and told him to go to Blood's and bring him the amount in coal. The man kept the money but did not deliver the coal. The way the Dutchman tells the story is what makes it interesting. "I givs him dot money und I say, 'You go up by Ploot's und pring me town some coals some more. I vaits und vaits and py shiminy he prings no coals some more. So I goes by dot man und I say, 'Vere ish dem coals vot I vant?' Und he say, 'I no been up by Ploot's.' Den I dakes shome more money und I go up by Ploot's und I prings town dem coals meinself shome more. Den I goesh by dot man und I say, 'Vere ish my money?' and he say, 'I no got em, I lets em go.' Und den he goesh up by der meetin' housh und he sing, 'Shesus bays em all—all dot tebt vot I owes.' Py shiminy, I guess dot christian mans runs dot shesus mans in tebt more as he effer bays."

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.

It is the old turnpike which thousands of Christians hav traveled. When a sinner gets washed in the blood of the lamb somebody may calculate to get bled.

JOHN PECK.

Murderers Emboldened by Christianity.

SALIDA, COL., Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Another name enrolled for liberty, joining in the onward and upward march under the banner of TRUTH SEEKER literature, the grandest paper extant. Mr. Long, whose name we send in support of truth, is a thinker, a reader, a quiet, moral man of sterling worth. Having seen a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he was able to appreciate its excellence.

Salida has a population of three thousand people; an altitude of about seven thousand feet; a situation at the confluence of the south and main Arkansas rivers; five churches, and increasing immorality standing high on the criminal docket. Unlawful life-taking seems to be the order. A man who will giv evidence to the truth in court upon some of these acts of outlawry appears to fall under violent and harsh language from those who would be citizens of exemplary standing. As to the public journals, none of them dare attack the lion in his den. "Believe and you shall be saved," with other similar gospel doctrin taught from the various pulpits, seems to say to those who may engage in crimes: Jesus Christ has long since bled and died for the sins of poor humanity. Go forth stained in blood and crime, and when you take your exit from earth to the unknown only hav faith. Throw yourself upon the saving grace of Christ and your sins, though as scarlet, shall be made white as snow. Is it not an easy step from earth's criminal court into the kingdom where awaits a blessed immortality and a new harp? Does not this system of religion build a hope for the criminal, while it shades the Infidel with dark forebodings?

Gospel-Peddling Is Like Other Traffic.

GLADDENS, PA., Jan. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Has it ever occurred to any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER how like unto temporal affairs all spiritual or religious schemes are operated and manipulated? It is traffic, barter, and gain from its inception to final consummation. The manufacturer of any commercial commodity modifies his wares to meet the ever-changing whims of fashion and adapts his productions to such competition as the markets present. Likewise hav done the makers of creeds and dogmas, hence thousands of gospel-shops are to-day offering on the open markets a variety of their productions in the line of opinions, imagination, and wind. The manufacturer and man of commerce, not satisfied with local trade, reaches out, extends his business to foreign climes. Likewise do creed-mongers peddle their airy commodities to every accessible region wherever can be found credulous humanity to buy of them that which, like a fakir, they offer free, and which finally proves a costly investment. The difference is, however, that temporal barter givs something of intrinsic value in exchange for something else equally valuable, whilst spiritual barter dickers only in wind, imagination, mansions in the skies, angel wings, harmoniously strung harps, and crowns which are said to be made from gold but are not or they would not be so anxious to exchange them for terrestrial mansions, good clothes, well-filled larders, or for any tangible good thing here below. The ravens that once fed that fabled man of God now themselvs feed on carrion, and the angel who came down from her celestial kitchen to bake the famishing old fellow a pancake lost her frying-pan in transit back to the heavenly hearth, and since that time I notice all men of God and prophets hustle around for a living as well as all other ordinary mortals.

Yours in the wool dyed and a yard wide,
M. L. TAUBER.

Open Letter to Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., of New York.

Jan. 25, 1892.

THOMAS DIXON, JR., Rev. Sir: Your opinion of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll is singular for that of a theologian, and, being printed in country newspapers, as it is, may serve to incite a revolution in the minds of many of the populace. I assure you I am acquainted with many rustics who, if they were granted an introduction to the colonel or by opportunity saw him, I feel certain would wish a removal of his boots.

You say you "honestly believe that God has raised up Mr. Ingersoll to be, in one sense, his prophet." In one sense, you hav grown to believe, he is the mouthpiece of God. You are sure that, "with all his recklessness of statement, and all his stupid ignorance of history, he has done much to rid the world of superstitions, lies, shams, humbugs, traditions, and pretenses that used to pass current as orthodox truth." My dear sir, your remarks are alarming. If you are an orthodox theologian, you are about the original one to praise the anti-theological work of Ingersoll. You think he is doing good. You say, "Giv him rope." By this do you offer him your pulpit? Do you advise the public to read "Some Mistakes of Moses" and "Interviews on Talmage?"

Can you explain how the colonel, "in one sense the prophet of God," and who is, as you think, "stupidly ignorant of history," has, by "reckless statements," killed so many "superstitions, lies, shams, humbugs, traditions, and pretenses" that were once considered Christianity, and were so set forth by the "called of God?" Surely, Mr. Dixon, you are advocating a sort of theological homeopathy.

If Ingersoll is actually "stupidly ignorant of history," and has made many "reckless statements," I most respectfully suggest that some one enlighten him, and especially publicly correct his "statements," for many thousands hav listened to his lectures, more thousands hav read some of his writings, and probably thousands of people are consequently crammed with error.

Yours with kindly intention,
EDWIN N. BEECHER.

The Lie on Its Travels.

NEW DULUTH, MINN., Dec. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find clipping from the Church Record showing conclusivly that the preachers hav not the honesty to acknowledge their error as stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 28th, or probably they imagin they are so far from the colonel that he will not reply. If he will not, he still has a friend or so left in this vicinity. It would seem so by the multitude of people who turned out to hear him last summer when he addressed them on the genius of Shakspere. There was scarcely standing-room for a cane in the vestibule of the Temple Opera of Duluth.

I hav written the Record for its authority as to what the colonel said—i. e., what it has placed in his mouth. You may print the clipping so some of the brothers can see the honesty of the preachers in this part of the country, "the Head of the Lakes." With this in the cause of Freethought and reform, I remain,

Yours as ever, H. H. SOLMON.

P.S.—Hurrah for Heston and his Thanksgiving subject. H. H. S.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Peoria, Ill., has recently entered its new and elegant building, which is erected upon the exact site of Robert Ingersoll's former home. Some of the bricks of his old house went into the new structure. One part of the building is used for a Bible depository. In another is the office of the Evangel, an aggressiv religious paper. The very spot where Ingersoll wrote his Infidel lecture is thus consecrated to aggressiv Christianity. Here he sat and prophesied the downfall of the Bible and the failure of religion. Here he wrote his famous prophecy that in ten years there would be two theaters built for every new church in this land. And now the very ground is occupied as a storehouse for Bibles, and the walls of the new building echo daily to the sound of praise and prayer. One cannot help being reminded of the fact that Voltaire's old house was afterward occupied by the Geneva Bible Society, and packed from cellar to attic with copies of the book whose speedy downfall he mockingly foretold. We can not help wondering what Mr. Ingersoll would think if he should visit his former home. If he had been in Peoria at the Christian Endeavor convention, with its thousand and more enthusiastic delegates, he must hav realized that Christianity is not dead yet, by any means. And the million and more of this Endeavor army hav all enlisted in the ten years that hav passed since he so confidently predicted the early end of religion. Mr. Ingersoll may be a good corporation lawyer, but as a prophet he is not a shining success.

Unphilanthropic Freethinkers.

HARWICH, MASS., Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Again the year has rolled around when our paper demands a renewal of subscription, which I cheerfully comply with.

It does seem to me that Christians are more zealous for their nonsensical stuff than Freethinkers are in extirpating it. What a power in the land we should be were we all standing shoulder to shoulder, well organized, doing our level best to propagate the Freethought ideas that we profess. I feel somewhat culpable myself in that I do not make more effort in the good work of disseminating the principles of our cause, and stirring up both the Christians and the Freethinkers of this the most advanced community of any part of the state of Massachusetts. I say advanced —I mean only in theory, not in practical, zealous work; for here there are very few, comparativly, who really believe in the doctrin of their profession. They go to and keep up their church meetings and routine worship more from habit than from a consciousness of the worth of their religion, and it commends itself so little to their understanding that a radical Freethinker may go fishing or hunting, work in the field or shop, ride, run, or play croquet or dominoes to his heart's content on Sunday without molestation. And this is not so much as a result of what we hav done lately, but from the effects of the antislavery movement of thirty to forty years ago, which took deep root here when Garrison, Pillsbury, Foster, Heywood, May, and many more whose names are too numerous to mention here, showed up the terrible culpability of the church in her hypocrisy in lending her influence in upholding and perpetuating that "sum of all villainies." And the Freethinkers, too, in this region are only so in theory—no practical, earnest work. "I don't care a damn" is the watchword. "The world is moving; it can't go backward." And so they content themselvs with the idea that to-morrow will be as this day and much more abundant.

Find inclosed $4 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Bible Picture Book. I do not hav time to travel much to get subscribers, though if I were sure of getting one I would go from Dan to Beersheba. I will try, however. B. F. ROBBINS.

On Us, and Finance.

HARTFORD, KAN., Jan. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you that I am wonderfully pleased with the changes made in your appearance at the beginning of the new year, and hope to see no return to the old style. I hav heretofore found some fault with the editorials on account of their being too few in number, too lengthy, and too purely argumentativ; but I think the classic style, the poetic imagery, and the generalizing breadth of each article in the paper for January 2d demonstrated that our Editor can, if needful, summarize the salient features of current events in the world's history to perfection. I like the changes in many respects. The print is clearer, the pages more neat and attractiv. I also like the pictures of our leading Freethought writers in connection with their advertised books, which attract the attention of observers and interest the children. I wish you would also giv us the portraits of Prof. J. W. Draper, Herbert Spencer, Tyndall, Huxley, and others. What a galaxy of Freethought luminaries we might hav shining on the outside pages every week, inviting the world to come on with their shining dollars and find out what golden thoughts hav emanated from the sun-lit temples which overarch those features so uniformly magnificent in their impressiv solidity and sensibleness! At least, giv each Freethought author a fair shake in turn in the picture line, if not too expensiv.

I dislike to refer again to the subject of Mr. Ingersoll's critics, but I think Mr. Wilson has done that gentleman an injustice, in his otherwise fair and generally sensible article, when he asserts that Mr. Ingersoll "favors the bald-headed bank president" as against the miner. I hav understood Mr. Ingersoll to say that he was in favor of the free coinage of silver. If the bullion in a silver dollar is worth 100 cents, why do not European nations so estimate it? The government could stamp the words "One dollar" on 40 ounces of silver as well as 412 ounces and force the people of this country to receive it as a full legal tender for one dollar's worth of goods or debts, but that would not affect the bullion value of silver. It would debase the currency, but it would not debase the bullion. We would then be simply using coin which other countries would rate and receive at about one-tenth or one-twelfth of its home debt-paying value. Such a specie as that would never be exported, because it would be worth so much more at home; but all of the gold in the country would find its way to other countries and stay there. Then we would come at once to a silver basis, and find that all of our foreign transactions were subject to a regular system of discounting. Our paper money based on a debased coin would also suffer depreciation in the markets of the world, and our bonds would not be negotiable except at a fabulous discount. All our gold would be insufficient to redeem outstanding gold liabilities, and national bankruptcy would supervene. Any attempt to pay these foreign obligations in a depreciated currency would be resented as an outrage and resisted by war with every commercial nation at once.

This shows us what would be the effect of a debasement of the current coin of the country. And the same effects, although in a less degree, would in a few years be seen to follow our present system of coining silver dollars out of 73 cents' worth of silver, should the balance of trade turn against us, as it certainly would if the present protectiv tariff system were abolished. A. H. DARROW.

Christ a Good Fellow in His Way.

HANGMAN CREEK, WASH., Jan. 5, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I got into the TRUTH SEEKER family by being a subscriber to Freethought.

Without meaning any harm to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say that it does not entirely console me for the loss of my little Freethought. The way I miss that little friend is surprising. And more especially do I miss Geo. Macdonald. His "Observations" were simply immense. I did so want to keep track of the progress of that little Eugene. He must be quite Roman, to judge from his father's observations concerning him. Oh, well, Freethought is gone, and it cannot be helped now. But all the same, I think if Freethinkers on the West side had done their duty Freethought would hav been alive and prospering to-day. I could not find the money to subscribe for it until I went to work and did washing for some of my neighbors' farm hands, and in that way I got Freethought. It now looks as though I would hav to do some more rustling if I want to keep up my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I know some so-called Freethinkers around here who are amply able to subscribe who do not, nor did they subscribe for Freethought. Of course, it is everybody to their own notion. But I think it the duty of Liberals to at least try to support the Liberal press. There is nothing grieves me more. However, I do all I can as far as (as we say out West) chin-music is concerned. And I had the satisfaction of routing, with the assistance of Bell's "Hand-Book of Freethought," a Bible-peddler last spring. He went at us hammer and tongs. The war of words went on for about a half-hour, and he thought it time to retreat. He made the mistake, as the Christians generally do, of losing his temper. He told me that I would surely go to hell. I told him that I was not afraid of hell, as I had never seen the place, and had never seen any satisfactory proof of there being such a place. He said I could find all the proof needed in the holy Bible. I told him that I thought that the person who went to the Bible for proof of anything was considerably "off his base." He asked me what I thought of Jesus Christ. I told him I thought that Christ was a very good fellow in his way, but was like lots of people there are nowadays, who want to make a living without work. And as for his teachings, they were all right so long as Christ kept his temper, but when he was out of humor he said and did, according to the Bible, some of the most silly and ridiculous things imaginable. Mr. Bible Man lost his temper at that and went on at an awful rate. "Now," said I to him, "you are following Christ's example and are losing your temper." That was too much for him. He took his books and left. I asked him to call again, but he did not say he would.

The Methodists dedicated a church to the great I Am in Spangle, our post-office town, on New Year's day. I suppose they had a big time. Spangle is a village of about three hundred people, and they now hav three gospel-shops there. To show to what an extent they will carry their cheek, I will mention an affair that took place in Spangle about four weeks ago. There was a Farmers' Alliance in Spangle and they concluded to resign their charter and form a N. F. A. and I. U. At the time the Alliance had some $60 or $70 in the treasury. After paying all dues and obligations, this was the Christians' show. They put resolutions before the house to hav the surplus divided between the three churches. But they did not make it, for it was voted down and the money was divided between the three school districts which are represented in the Alliance.

I send you by this mail sixty-one names on a petition to the World's Fair commission. One of your subscribers, Frank Forsland, first started to circulate it, and then Mrs. Jessie C. Fleming took hold of it, and last it fell to my lot. I took it with me to the Cœur D'Alene mountains in Idaho this fall, so it has traveled over quite a scope of country to be so small. However, it will be so many more names added to the list.

I will close by giving three cheers for Heston, and wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER a long and happy life.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,
MRS. CLEMEY LACEY.

Only Sleight-of-Hand.

HOWICK, CAN., Dec. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As I see much discussion about the Georgia Magnet, it may be interesting to some of your readers to get my experience with the same person or another one like her. About fifteen months ago a woman came and performed at Alexandria, Ont., where I lived at that time. She was rather a handsome brunet, pretty tall, but not big, about thirty years of age. She called herself Jeannie Deans, and said she hailed from St. Louis. She was accompanied by a man who assisted her, and they gave us about three hours of the best entertainment I ever had of the kind. The woman introduced herself as a magician; said she would endeavor to entertain us with deception. She claimed no supernatural power; said she was sleight-of-hand and nothing more. She performed a great many tricks, some very laughable and some very wonderful, and all done perfectly. But I shall only mention a few of them. She was put into a large bag that we had thoroughly examined, the bag tied up over her head and then sewed up. All was done in plain sight of the audience. Then a curtain was held up by two men between her and the audience about five seconds. When it was dropped down there sat the woman, and the bag that lay on the floor was again handed us for examination, and it was not ripped, torn, or untied, and the two men out of the audience that held the curtain said they had seen no more how it was done than we had. The woman then asked any man out of the audience to come to her on the platform. A young doctor went, and she put a glass in his hand and dropped a small coin in the glass, and then walked about twenty feet away from the doctor and began to speak to that coin. She asked the coin how many drinks a certain man had drunk and paid for before breakfast. The coin made three jumps and made the glass ring every time. She asked many more questions, and all was answered by the coin. Then she took out the coin and put a pack of cards in the glass and made that perform a long time. She would order any card to pop up and show itself, and then she called about a dozen of the cards to jump clear out and to fall down on the floor, and all was done as she ordered. Then the man distributed paper and envelopes to the audience. Twelv or fifteen of us took paper and wrote as we pleased, folded the paper, placed it in the envelopes, and sealed them. Then the attendant gathered them in his hat, and placed the hat on a table near her. The hall was well lit up all the time. She took these letters one at a time, folded them in two without looking at them at all, pressed them against her forehead, and read them all correctly. One was written in French. She said she could not read French, but could spell it, and did spell it out. Then she called two young men from the audience and made them sit on two chairs, and then defied them to move off. The boys tried with all their might, but in vain. They could twist themselvs any way they liked, but could not raise their feet from the floor, nor their bodies from the chairs, nor the chairs from the floor, until she relieved them, and to relieve them she did nothing that anyone could see except to tell them they might get up. At the close she announced an entirely new program for the next night. One of the feats would be handling five or six strong men on the end of a billiard cue; another, to lift a heavy man on a chair; another, to prevent any man from lifting her, etc. But the next night she could not perform for the want of an assistant. The man that accompanied her was a drunkard and a villain. He remained there beastly drunk until he was so in debt that he ran away for fear of being mobbed, and left the woman without a cent. I kept her at my house a few days, raised a subscription, and sent her to Toronto. While she was at my house she told me that she passed as a medium when performing in countries where she considered it advisable to do so. She offered to show me almost all her tricks if I would help her to perform a few nights to raise money to go to St. Louis. I could not spare the time.

Now, this woman's power seemed to lie in her attendant, who probably operated some kind of a battery behind a curtain. However, it is quite evident that without assistance she was powerless. And I fancy Mrs. Abbott's power is like Jeannie Deans's, and would not be at all surprised if the two names answered for the same woman.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Prue's Opinion.

Little Prue'd been very busy all the morning with her broom.
"Helping mamma," so she told us, as she went from room to room
Making little dusty whirlwinds as she swung her broom about.
"Bless her heart, she thinks she's helping," mamma laughed, "beyond a doubt."

When the call to dinner sounded little Prue did not respond.
"Strange," said mamma, "when there's chicken," for of chicken Prue was fond.
"Look about and find her, children. She was hungry hours ago
When she smelled the chicken cooking, but she said she'd wait and grow."

All about the house we sought her, upstairs, downstairs, everywhere,
But each one came back reporting that no little Prue was there.
"Seems to me I saw her sitting on the back porch," grandma said,
"When I went to shoo the hens off, scratching in the berry bed."

There we found the missing darling with her broom across her lap,
And her head against the clapboard in a deep and dreamful nap.
And we had to shake and shake her ere the heavy lids would rise
That the roguish dream-elves' fingers pressed upon the sleepy eyes.

"Chicken's waiting," called out mamma. "Aren't you hungry, little one?"
"I'm dest starvin'," was the answer, "but I dreamed such lots of fun.
Dreamed I was a-eatin' chicken, an' it tasted awful dood,
But it didn't stop my hungry, seems so, as it ought to should."

"I dot dreffle tired a-workin'," Prue explained, o'er heaped-up plate,
"So I sought I'd rest a minnit, an' I went asleep, right straight.
My! Ain't chicken dood? I dreamed so, but, I"—with wise young head ashake,— "It tastes better in my stummick when I eat it wide awake."

A Dream.

I hav had such a strange dream. It seemed that I was soaring among the solar bodies. Pausing in ethereal blue, I could see neither land, sea, nor forests. Among the great revolving planets, I was but a mote in the sunshine. I naturally turned to the sun. Not being able to withstand his glaring face, I looked to Jupiter, the monarch of planets. I became deeply impressed with his serenity, his magnificence, and his solitary grandeur. Peering among the great constellations, I exclaimed, "Glorious universe! Your greatness extends farther than the eye can pierce the azure of this eternal dome."

At this instant, in her green and flowery garment, with her coat of rippling waters, earth came whirling by. I stepped into her atmosphere, and resting upon her airy wings, lingered henceforth with her. Sweeping away the cobwebs of time, before me appeared the earth in her early stages. Long years in obscurity had she sped her way among the brilliant suns of the universe. True, the sun shed brightest light on her mountains and plains; the broad extended blue of her billowy seas; each flower and leaf spread broadcast its loveliness, yet no record was kept of their beauty save their own faint outline on the cooling lava which some fiery mountain spread upon their tender green. The gayety of earth's morn is folded tenderly away in the rock-strewn bed of earth.

Man has begun his existence. He livs in the forest. Through his haunt sweep the cruel winds and snows of adversity. He heeds them not. He patiently awaits a brighter day—a springtime hour, when the cold sheets of winter shall be lifted from the shivering face of each bud and root, and all nature leap with joy from her deep and dreamy slumber—all burst again into the arena of life. Man, proud monarch of forest, mountain, and plain, shall walk amid the beauties of some mountain glade, there to sit and muse in a quiet nook, with no other companion than the book of Nature.

Time glides on. Each succeeding year brings to my anxious gaze some picture of renewed interest. Nations rise and fall. Egypt and Persia, Greece and Rome, each had its day of splendor, of pomp and pride; but they also had their night of darkness. I saw men wild with excitement, terror-stricken, plunging into the arena of war. I saw the gallant sons of Athens and Sparta, as their sweeping phalanx made for them a path of blood. Each day filing in the ranks of war, each day ranking in the files of death. On, and on, they go, sweeping humanity into an early grave. With all her learning, genius, and beauty, Greece fell by the hand of proud and haughty Rome.

Tyranny is doomed to die. Rome is doomed to fall. Lured by ambition, she failed to profit by the fate of her sister nations. The fate of Cæsar was the fate of Rome. The fate of Greece and Rome was the fate of civilization. The awful doom of time hurled humanity into the depths of intellectual darkness. No light was left to guide the weary traveler into the paths of ancient learning. Slowly time gathers the few remaining fragments of Grecian civilization, unfurls her sails, and embarks once more on the sea of progress. I saw men sailing out on the unknown sea in search of new and beautiful lands, where humanity might build, learn, and prosper. I saw the brave Columbus as he stood at the prow of his vessel, reaching far out to touch and kiss the shores of a new world. I saw proud America welcome the oppressed to her shores. I heard her great statesmen as they pleadingly aroused the spirit of American independence. I saw her brave sons shed their life-blood for freedom. When the cloud had subsided from the political horizon, I saw her, like the flowers of the field, bud and blossom until the echo of every land shouted joyously: "America and liberty!"

I saw the great Napoleon as he entered a life of fame and final defeat and disgrace. I saw all his early victories. I saw him, as he stepped upon the throne of France, proudly take the imperial crown and place it upon his own head. I saw him at Moscow leading thousands into the jaws of death. I saw him at Waterloo, the emotions surging over his sad face like waves at high tide. It was his day of doom. I saw him borne to St. Helena. From obscurity to a throne, from a throne to exile.

There are many forms of slavery. Primitiv man was a slave to phantoms, medieval man to fame and ambition; modern man is a slave to the almighty dollar.

I saw woman, even woman, in abject slavery. Finally I saw her, beneath the shadow of the statue of Liberty, proudly, boldly step to the front and demand her rights on an equality with man. These rights were partially granted.

I hope the time is not far distant when they will be universally so. It is alone for principle, for equality, and for justice, and not that I think it would be any great honor to me to trudge into the stall to vote. So the world moves. Through the recesses of time, with the roar and echo, the awful din, of war, I heard the eloquence of Demosthenes, the pleas of Plato, the earnest vows of martyrs, and the feeble recantation of Galileo.

When the earth was in a more peaceful mood, I saw the quivering pen of the immortal Shakspere as he pictured the terrible tragedies earth had wrought. Time, time, immortal time! what changes hast thou made! All the glittering gems of the eternal heavens, the depths of the waves, the clamor of cities, humanity's ever-varied scenes, tell of thy changes. Ye rest not, ye sleep not, nor dream. In your arms you bear all the sorrows and cares and woes of a world; in your deep oblivious bosom you hold the secrets of eternity. At nightfall the weary stag bounds o'er the turf to his lair; the eagle from the plain soars to his home among the rocky cliffs; careworn humanity by toil is lulled to rest, but thou, O time! in thy strength of years, hast not a moment which thou canst call thine own. Earth may run red with streams of blood, be distracted by the tornado of civil strife, or the clamor of revolution, yet from her course time never swerves. Orators may shake the earth with their tremulous words; songsters may fill the air with melodious music; through their unworded minstrelsy the birds may sing forth their greetings, but time no ear doth giv.

Every breeze that murmurs by, every flower that spreads perfume, every leaf of the forest deep, every blade of waving grass, every twitter of the bird, every laugh of the happy child, every lullaby of the anxious mother, every walk of man on earth, every woe and every joy, every wrong and every good, every ebb and every flow of human progress, are fibers all in the great warp and woof of life. Time, the loom, is ever impelled by a mighty stream which I called the Rhine of time.

Roll on, O Rhine, in your narrow bed;
Roll on, ye dashing torrents of the Nile;
Roll on, ye maddened waters of earth;
Roll to your utmost; be ye hurled!
Leap and splash till your woes are said;
But do not injure one single file
Of humanity about the hearth,
Where man essays to improve the world.

Roll on, ye tides of human thought;
Roll on, ye laughing streams of mirth;
Roll on, fair verdure, flowered and green;
Roll on, in all your beauty, roll!
Let not your pride be bought
With the woes that afflict this earth;
Let glorious good be ever seen,
And wrong no more her sad bells toll.

Roll on, ye mists that cloud the sun;
Roll on, ye darkening waves of grief;
Roll on, ye planets in your course;
Roll on, in marts of progress, roll!
For humanity Earth's beauties won,
And drop a tear on history's leaf
That failed to record the universal source
Of time's unceasing roll.

A dream? Do you think it was all a dream? Was there no wooing phantom of time whispering in my ear? No. It was all a dream. I can only compare it to the fantastic shapes, the forestlike beauty, which cover our rippling streams in winter. Just so thought steals in upon our slumbers and freezes in joy or sorrow, there to surprise our waking.

UNDERWOOD, IA., Jan. 19, 1892.

MISS WIXON: Again I seek the Corner for a chat. Some months ago I wrote a letter for the Children's Corner, and a few weeks after I received a dozen or more letters from readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and such good ones! No one could read them and not find themselvs carried into a channel of thought which was elevating.

Not one but I would hav been proud to exhibit. Of course I could not answer all, but, with the permission of my parents, I replied to several, and I find their letters are growing daily more beneficial and instructiv. With such soldiers the army of Freethought must prosper, for intelligence will win. We young folks, then, should strive to make ourselvs, not cranks and fanatics, odious to all who know us, but noble, pure, and intellectual men and women. Yours for liberality,

GLEE BRITTON.

P. S.—Some one, after writing me a letter full of kind wishes, etc., now sends me papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Boston Investigator; and although I do not know who they are, I wish to thank them.

ELSINORE, CAL., Dec. 28, 1891.

DEAR CORNER FRIENDS: While the cold winds of December are blowing the snowflakes right and left in the East, we of California are basking in the warmth of a southern sun.

Christmas is past! But Christ was not born in California, and besides we are not in his favor, and, probably for that reason, old Santa—friend of my childhood—scarcely noticed us. Why do Infidels keep Christmas? Why do they not keep New Year's instead? Of course, around Christmas day many tender recollections of childhood cling; but to us, who reject the Christ-child whose birthday the Christians celebrate, is not New Year's more suggestiv?

On New Year's day all are more or less mindful of the years past and the years to come; and are bound to think seriously of the great unknown future lying in the mists of the imagination—waiting to be told by the oracle of the years.

On New Year's appropriate gifts might be exchanged, and in time perhaps we could escape from the foolish feeling it givs one to receive a "Christ Died For You" card, painted in gilt letters on a background resembling the Bible, surrounded by clouds so strangely tinged that it makes one think uneasily of hell-fire.

I think that we younger people forget that the burden of our cause will soon rest upon our shoulders. We admire the eloquence of Ingersoll and approve the measures taken by others to promote Liberalism; but do we ever stop to wonder who will take up the load that these workers must drop at the grave? In our little lake-side village the church holds the scepter of power. Every Sunday morning the little flock of "faithful followers" listen to a sermon concerning Christ's life—every Sunday evening the same persons, in the same places, listen to the story of his death—until I really believe that each would take it as a personal insult if a Freethought lecturer should stop in the valley and drop a hint that perhaps after all hell is cooling off.

The school, which is a sort of theological concern, is, with one exception, under the government of Methodists. One of the instructors (who astonished at least two of his students by remarking that there was "nothing to science anyway") does not like the two little Infidel girls who are as wolves among his little flock of sheep.

And he evidently does not accept Darwin's idea of evolution. "To think," he sneered, "of imagining one's ancestors sitting with their tails wound around the limb of a tree, throwing cocoanuts at each other," and immediately the little "flock" became convulsed with laughter at the absurdity of the idea.

The "disturbing element" was advised by an outside party to suggest to him that, from all visible evidences, his ancestors indulged in that pastime several centuries later than theirs did. But we held our peace. So much religion is taught in the school that we feel in duty bound to mix a little Infidelity in the composition of our essays now and then.

Though nothing violent, this is a great trial to our teacher, no doubt.

One young Christian in the school has a strange way of talking of things he knows nothing about, and of mixing evolution and religion in an amusing manner. In one of his essays he referred to "that time when the earth, a seething, boiling mass, fresh from the hands of the creator," etc. The pious lifted their eyes and bowed their heads, while the "wolves" in the flock wondered vaguely of what God's hands were made.

Last winter, night after night, the church was lighted, the room heated, and the collection taken up, in the revival meetings. I remember of attending one night when it was extremely interesting. As there were a number of us "hell bound and no help" ones there, we were not molested, but quietly enjoyed (?) the scene from a remote corner of the room (as far from the stove as we could get, in fact). Every window in the building was securely fastened, and whenever the door was opened to admit some one, the minister looked uneasy. With expressiv gestures and imploring looks I entreated the janitor to open some window the least little crack, but he mournfully shook his head. Well, I soon began to understand matters, for, as the room grew warmer, the sinners in answer to the wails, "Come to Jesus, come to Jesus, come to Jesus just now," accordingly began to come. One old man that they converted cried and cried, then resorted to groans, and finally shouted amid sobs and wails, "Oh, good Lord—boo-hoo," which was all I could hear, and I heartily agreed with him.

When a sufficient number gathered around the altar and the "holy man of God" began to pray I was rather alarmed. He seemed to be undergoing perfect spasms of pain and convulsions of agony and I almost doubted whether he could stay the service out, when suddenly his countenance would clear and he would entreat the candidates "bound for glory" to sing "I can, and I will, and I do believe," which they would repeat three times in the same key, and then end up with the remarks that "Jesus saves me now." To which song an Infidel quartet, under swaying pepper tree boughs, replied the next day, "I can't, and I won't, and I don't believe, that Jesus saves me now," which no doubt was very wicked, and which, with a number of other things, we hope God will forget.

One disgusting, yet amusing feature of that night's revival was that an earnest "seeker" while kneeling at the "great physician's" altar was suddenly taken sick at his stomach (and no wonder, the room was sickeningly hot). He went rushing madly up the aisle and reached the door, not in time, however, to satisfy a couple of ladies who sat on the outside row nearest him in his flight. I wondered afterward why, as he was so near to the "great physician's" office door, he didn't call and be healed. But I suppose it's only another evidence of my "total depravity" to wonder at such things. Well, although the church has it pretty much her own way here at present, she will not always. I hope some day to see this little village—the loveliest one in the West—a "hotbed of Infidelity."

I almost pity you who are snow-bound in the East, for here the poppies will soon be blowing, the oranges blossoming, and all nature smiling. Adios.

EDNA HEALD.

News of the Week.

SPURGEON, the noted English preacher, is dead.

LAST Sunday in Fall River, Mass., newspapers or meals could not be bought after 10 o'clock.

SOCIALISTS in Germany hav been punished for not rising at the drinking of the emperor's health.

CATHOLICS will hav a Catholic school exhibit at the World's Fair, as helpful to their endeavor to persuade Americans to admit their school system.

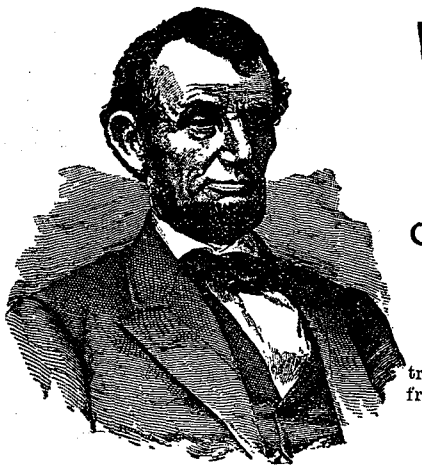
LAST Sunday great numbers of police were required to disperse what reports call "the disorderly mob who attend the open-air Socialist meetings on Sundays" in London.

A SOCIETY to stamp out Christianity in China has been formed in that country. "Infamous and obscene libels" on Christianity are widely circulated. Trouble seems likely.

ROBERT DUNLAP went to Louisville, Ky., to enter the Trappist monastery. His actions showed him to be crazy, and as this was strangely thought to unfit him for admission, he was arrested.

THE typhus caused by the famin in Russia is making great ravages. The more fanatical peasants believe Count Tolstoi to be Antichrist and refuse his bounty for fear of committing their souls to perdition. The czar struggles along on his income of $12,000,000 yearly.

ON the demand that Rev. H. Davies, of Norwalk, Conn., resign because of heresy, a prominent member of his congregation made this remark to a reporter: "Parson Davies is rapidly becoming an Atheist, and I can see no excuse for him, unless it is that he is insane."



LIBERTY-LOVING members of the German parliament are opposing the bill, favored by the emperor, empowering officials to imprison persons denounced to them as habitual drunkards till they get a medical certificate that they hav been cured of the liquor habit. Such persons' property is to be seized and applied to the support of themselvs and their families.

THE pope has delivered an allocution in which he complains of the persecution of the church in Italy, which "still grows more and more intense and increases in keenness every new day." He says: "The obstinate hostility of the enemies by whom we are surrounded oppresses and harasses us." His enemies "strive that by the popular voice they may win a harder lot for the vicar of Jesus Christ, and that no more privilege may be left to him than is allowed by the law to any private citizen."

LAST Sunday the acting mayor of Burlington, N. J., while the mayor was absent licensed the Waite Comedy Company to giv a sacred concert at the Opera House. The clergy on hearing were horrified at the prospectiv loss of dollars to themselvs, and on the mayor's return waited on him and forced him to hunt up a law on which no concerts to which admission was charged could be held Sundays, except their own. The concert was forbid, and the churches resounded with the mayor's praise.

GARZA'S revolution grows. President Diaz, against whom it is directed, has done more to advance Mexico by roads, railroads, manufacture, schools, law, etc., than any other man, but because he has disfavored ecclesiasticism the priests would overthrow him. The Mexican government has asked of Secretary Blaine permission to send troops on Texan soil when necessary in pursuit of Garza, but has received no reply. Texans say they will kill intruding Mexican troops, and Mexicans say the same of Texans.

THE czar intends to reëstablish serfdom in Russia. This institution was abolished about twenty years ago, owing to the agitation against it excited by Tourgeneff, the novelist and Freethinker, who wrote books that may be called the "Uncle Tom's Cabins" of the movement for its abolition. Thus serfdom, established in Russia under the reign of Christianity, was abolished by a Freethinker and in a period of Liberal rule, and is now to be restored during the prevalence of a policy of fanaticism. The czar will redistribute the land and bind the peasants to certain tracts, from which they will not be allowed to move. One-third of the crops will be sold by the government to pay local debts to the state, one-third will be taken for taxes, and the remaining third left the serfs to liv on. These serfs will be compelled to fulfill their obligations, the knout being applied if necessary. The system will be first applied to the provinces of Samara and Saratoff, and if found possible there will be intrusted to the district officials, seemski natchalniki. These, recruited from the reactionary nobility, will be certain to report it a success.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Materialism:

Its History and Its Influence Upon Society.

By DR. LOUIS BUCHNER, Author of "Force and Matter," etc.

Translated from the German.
Paper, 12mo, 15 cents.

Gems of Thought.

To the educated man the feeling of acquired knowledge yields a higher satisfaction than love of the miraculous.—Grove.

LEAVE every copy of the Bible as it is, and hav every human being believe in its inspiration, and intellectual liberty would cease to exist. The whole race, from that moment, would go back toward the night of intellectual death.—Ingersoll.

BY means of this knowledge [of the unchangeableness of natural law] the soul obtains internal peace and unison with all nature and is thereby relieved of that superstitious dread, which has its foundation in the idea that some supernatural powers can interfere with the order of the eternal course of nature.—Oested.

I WOULD not hav anyone adopt my mode of living on any account; for, besides that before he has fairly learned it I may hav found out another for myself, I desire that there may be as many different persons in the world as possible; but I would hav each one be very careful to find out and pursue his own way, and not his father's, or his mother's, or his neighbor's instead.—Thoreau.

NOR did the Reformation immediately change the sacred theory of medicin. Luther, as is well known, again and again ascribed his own disease to "devils' spells," declaring that "Satan produces all the maladies which afflict mankind, for he is the prince of death," and that "he poisons the air;" but that "no malady comes from God." From that day down to the faith cures of Boston, Old Orchard, and among the sect of "Peculiar People" in our own time, we see the results among Protestants of seeking the cause of disease in Satanic influence and its cure in fetichism.—Prof. A. D. White.

THERE is related an instance of simplicity, which does honor to an Italian monk. One day, while preaching, this pious man thought he must announce to his audience that he had, thank heaven, at last discovered by dint of meditation, a sure way of rendering all men happy. "The devil," said he, "tempts men only to hav in hell companions of his misery. Let us therefore apply to the pope, who has the keys of heaven and hell; let us prevail on him to pray to God, at the head of the whole church, to consent to a reconciliation with the devil, to restore him to favor, to reinstate him in his former rank, which can not fail to put an end to his malicious projects against mankind." Perhaps the honest monk did not see that the devil is at least as useful as God to the ministers of religion.—D'Holbach.

WHAT a tissue of frauds, calumnies, and robberies, has been woven by fanatics of the court of Rome against fanatics of the court of Calvin, by jesuits against jansenists, and vice versa! And if you go farther back, you will find ecclesiastical history, which is the school of virtues, to be that of atrocities and abominations, which hav been employed by every sect against the others. They all hav the same bandage over their eyes, whether marching out to burn down the cities and towns of their adversaries, to slaughter the inhabitants, or condemn them to judicial executions, or when merely engaged in the comparatively calm occupation of deceiving and defrauding, of acquiring wealth and exercising domination. The same fanaticism blinds them: they think that they are doing good. Every fanatic is a conscientious knave, but a sincere and honest murderer for the good cause.—Voltaire.

You cannot blame me, O Lord, that, before making my "calling and election sure," I should take the pains to ascertain whether the game be worth the candle. The earth is no better than it should be; and, if I had the means to determin that heaven is preferable, I should be ready enough to go there. . . . But, as I was saying, I hav been trying to ascertain if heaven were worth the going to. In my opinion it is not. It is no inducement to me that there is no sunlight and no candlelight, "for the Lord God giveth them light" (Rev. xxii, 5). The eternal God gains nothing in my esteem by being converted into a gigantic glow-worm. It is nothing to me that heaven has "a wall great and high" (Idem, xxi, 12). I do not like walls. Giv me the wide landscape bounded only by the horizon-walls of the sky, with the mists slumbering on the hills and the forest murmuring mystery. I find that there are in heaven the jasper, the sardonyx, the beryl, the chrysoprasus, and the topaz. But I am no frivolous dandy who cares about the jasper and the topaz. I should hav been more anxious to get to heaven, O Lord, if you had assured me its gales were laden with the perfume of the birch and the heather, that primroses grew wild under the shadow of its hawthorns, and that happy children played among its meadows of new-mown hay.—Saladin in God and His Book.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

On the Press.

The work on the text of the new Bible picture book—Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated—is completed and the book is on the press and will be sent to purchasers as soon as the printers and binders can finish their labor upon it. It has four hundred pages, half of which are full-page pictures. Twenty-five well-known orthodox stories are illustrated as follows:

Adventures of Adam.
The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
Sustaining a Theory.
Some Giants.
The Adventures and Work of Noah.
A Hunting Anecdote.
Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
A Queer Family.
Isaac and His "Sister."
One of Twins.
Jacob and Esau.
Joseph the Man of Dreams.
Holy Moses.
Balaam the Diviner.
Bloody Joshua.
The Campaign of Deborah and Barak Against Jabin and Sisera.
General Gideon.

"Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," and Its Author.

We are sure our readers will be glad to again see something in these columns from the witty and facil pen of Helen H. Gardener, and we shall, therefore, print next week one of the strongest and best of the many able lectures written by her.

This lecture, "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," never before printed, was delivered by her in Newark, N. J., and brought down upon her the wrath of the late Monsignor Doane, a high Catholic dignitary. In the controversy which followed in the Newark press, we need not say to our readers who hav enjoyed the unanswerable logic, pungent wit, graceful humor, and unequivocal force of expression of Miss Gardener's style of writing, the monsignor was nowhere.

Although Miss Gardener has not recently written much for the Liberal press—it being with some difficulty that we induced her to come back into the fold—she has never ceased to work on the same lines, but in a different manner. Her stories which hav appeared in magazines like the Arena hav been read by many persons who are not accustomed to read Liberal literature, and hav all contained the same heresy as to orthodox religion, the same sharp thrusts at superstition and bigotry, the same eloquent demand for the recognition of her sex as an equal part of humanity with men, the same vigorous protest against the giving of a thoughtless yes to impudent authority, as are read in her "Men, Women, and Gods." All that Helen Gardener has written has a purpose—the betterment of humanity and of human conditions. The same ideas are conveyed through her books of fiction as are given in her essays. And our readers will doubtless be pleased that she has now in press another book of stories entitled, "Pushed by Unseen Hands," to be issued this month. Such of these stories as hinge upon heredity, like those in "A Thoughtless Yes," are in the preface of the new book paid the greatest compliment which can be given to a writer of fiction, because it is given by the recognized leading specialist in America on this subject. And Dr. Karl Ludwig Bernay, one of Germany's most eminent professional men, has signified his intention of translating "A Thoughtless Yes" for his nation's benefit and enjoyment.

Miss Gardener's wonderful versatility is indicated by the excellence of whatever she undertakes, whether it be an essay on Legal Contracts for the Popular Science Monthly, Common Sense in Surgery for a medical journal, or an article on religion for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Colonel Ingersoll says of her short stories, "They are wonderfully good;" Donn Piatt said, "This is genius of a rare sort;" and physicians all over this country and Europe hav written her of her heredity sketches, "You hav struck the keynote." The Liberals may well feel proud of so versatil and so effectiv a writer, who is at all times and in all places an outspoken Agnostic and a cultivated lady.

T. B. Wakeman says of "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," which will be printed next week, that it is the strongest of her heretical essays, and we hope all of our readers will circulate it among their Christian friends.

"Sitting Down" On Comstock!

Anthony Comstock received a merited rebuke from a United States judge in the Caspar case decided in Milwaukee last week. The case against Caspar was "worked up" by Comstock, who wrote to him under an assumed name from Chimney Point, Vt. The correspondence covered a period of several months. Comstock at first requested that some rare old books be sent to him. Caspar filled the order and the correspondence continued, Comstock gradually worming himself into the bookseller's confidence. Finally some highly colored pictures were asked for and received. They were sent for by express. This, however, did not suit Comstock, as, of coure, the United States laws had nothing to do with an offense of that nature. Accordingly he wrote to Caspar for more pictures, and said that the nearest express office was at Port Henry, N. Y., on the opposit shore of Lake Champlain. It put him to great trouble and considerable expense to obtain packages from there, and he asked Caspar to send the matter by mail. Caspar fell into the trap and Comstock caused his arrest.

Caspar pleaded guilty, though his attorney, a brother of Senator Vilas, used the occasion to denounce Comstock and to say things about him and his methods. In sentencing Mr. Caspar to pay a fine of five hundred dollars Judge Jenkins supplemented Mr. Vilas's remarks with these words:

"There are some offenses worse than the circulation of obscene literature. One of them is the practice of fraud and lying, of which Anthony Comstock is apparently guilty. Mr. Comstock may be able to reconcile his conduct with the laws of God and of morality, but this court cannot do so. I cannot approve the conduct of the government officer who has lured the defendant into the commission of a crime. I am aware that such methods are often pursued in dealing with alleged criminals, but I am not willing to lend my assent to such doctrin. If government officers cannot detect criminals and enforce laws without resorting to dishonest practices, they had better resign their positions. Mr. Comstock is known as a very zealous agent in preventing the spread of obscene literature, but in this case, instead of appealing to state law, which is ample for the emergency, he has seen fit to assume the name of another and lure the defendant into crime."

The United States statute known as the Comstock law ought to be repealed. The state statutes are ample. Two weeks ago we said that this law had been outrageously abused by unscrupulous men, and that its repeal could not lead to one-tenth the damage to decency that its retention upon the statute-books has done to endanger the liberty of the press and people. The words of Judge Jenkins amply bear us out.

Why Dead Laws Are Difficult to Repeal.

A Seattle, Washington, paper calls attention to the great difficulty of repealing obsolete laws, with special reference to Sunday and prohibition laws. It is a subject the people ought to consider more seriously than they seem likely to do. In the District of Columbia, for instance, there is at present in force an old Maryland statute punishing a persistent blasphemer by mulcting him of a certain amount of tobacco, then boring his tongue, then killing him. Of course the law is obsolete, and even the president himself, devoted follower of John Calvin that he is, has not sufficient influence to secure its enforcement.

That is because it goes a little too far for even Presbyterians to win against popular sentiment.

But in Pennsylvania there is a statute enacted ninety-eight years ago which is not only not obsolete but is being enforced in many towns in the state with great vigor by a lot of bigots. It is a "Sunday law," and it prohibits on the first day of the week about everything except the necessary eating and drinking to sustain life and going to church. Another law is one punishing blasphemy;

this, however, is practically dead, only one conviction under it having been secured for many years. But it is there, "like a frozen serpent," to be warmed to life by "the sunshine of opportunity."

While every sound consideration of public justice, says the Washington paper, demands the repeal of such laws, they are not repealed, because of the chance they giv for the old confusion of the function of a law and the function of a sermon. Nine-tenths of the men who violate the Sunday laws would probably refuse to vote for repeal, for the selfish reason that they suffered no personal discomfort by their presence on the statute-book, since they were sure not to be enforced, and to vote for repeal would giv a clump of cranks an opportunity to howl and to call a man a "Sabbath-breaker" and "Antichrist," because he voted to wipe off the books a law that public opinion had long ago repealed.

It is this indifference to broad considerations of principle, continues the Post-Intelligencer, to questions of near or remote public weal, this moral cowardice that dreads to be called a "Sabbath breaker" when it votes for a dead Sunday law, which explains the ease with which laws with a moral bugaboo in their bowels get in the statute-book, and explains why they are difficult to repeal when they are not only dying but dead. A law that involves nothing but a pure question of commercial methods can be easily altered and amended when the shoe pinches the public foot, but a bad law that does not happen to clearly puncture the individual pocket or pinch the toe of the majority, is always difficult to get rid of if it is possible to confuse the question of moral purpose with a question of remedy for admitted evil. When laws that are immoral or ineffectiv to moral ends are dead so long that they are a stench in the nostrils of the public, it takes a good deal of legislativ moral courage to carry out the corpse and bury it.

There is much truth in all this. In the legislature of our own state, for instance, there is a large delegation of "Sabbath" breakers—about two-thirds. They are men of the world, and pay no attention to Sunday when it suits them to do otherwise. They hold private meetings for making slates—a few of the Catholics doing it after church—go fishing, on excursions, eat, drink, and smoke themselvs merry, but—there are only a very few who would vote to repeal the Sunday law. Their liberty is not interfered with, and why should they incur the enmity of the church by going contrary to its wishes? They don't care—and are a trifle timid. So we hav Sunday laws enacted to please the puritans retained to placate a shadowy public sentiment which would be changed somehow if the laws were enforced upon those who hav the power to repeal them.

The Paine celebrations this year were more general and larger than on any previous year. New York led the list with its big meeting, at which Conway and Ingersoll spoke. In point of numbers probably Pittsburgh came next, with Mr. Charlesworth as orator. Boston had Mr. Wakeman, and Mr. Remsburg, and Mr. Washburn as orators. San Francisco turned out a big crowd to hear Mr. Putnam. Stockton and Los Angeles, Cal., had entertainments in honor of the occasion. Chicago had a great festal occasion, though some of its "invited" speakers did not appear. Perhaps a hundred more places where there are a few Freethinkers held little meetings which will not be heard of except by letter to the editor of some Freethought journal. But the general observance shows signs of Freethought activity and the gradual winning of a place for Paine in America's pantheon of heroes.

Ingersoll's Final Reply to His Telegram Critics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING TELEGRAM: Time and space are lacking to answer all who have replied to me. Several of the replies contain substantially the same lack of argument, and need not be noticed separately. A few are exceedingly absurd, and while reading them I thought of a saying of Thomas Paine: "To argue with a man who has renounced his reason is like giving medicine to the dead." This applies with great force to the author of one of the last and longest of these replies.

DR. DE COSTA.

The Rev. Dr. De Costa, drawing a distinction between Christianity and Churchianity—claiming, of course, to be governed himself by Christianity—calls me, in an exceedingly argumentative way, "a tiger," and then, to clinch the argument, suggests that, after all, "I may be an ass under a tiger's skin." Fearing that a loophole might still be left, he asserts that "some go so far as to assert that he [meaning myself] holds a brief for Satan, and is doing the best he can for his client."

He makes the familiar assertion that "by its fruits we may know Christianity." Now, if by Christianity he means kindness, candor, the spirit of investigation, observation, reason—in other words, if he aggregates what are called the virtues and calls them "Christianity"—then there need be no dispute.

But is this true? Every religion teaches a code of morals, plus something else, and it is this "something else" that determines what each religion is.

Buddhism is a code of morals, plus a belief in the transmigration of souls; in the illumination of Buddha; in certain prayers, ceremonies, genuflexions, and superstitions.

So Christianity is a code of morals, plus that the God of the Old Testament is the creator of the universe; that the Christ of the New Testament is the same God, and that by his death an atonement was made for all who should believe in him in a certain way, plus certain ceremonies and superstitions.

MORALITY OF CHRISTIANITY.

No one objects to the morality of Christianity. The industrious people of the world—those who have anything—are as a rule opposed to larceny; every large majority of people object to being murdered; and so we have laws against larceny and murder. A large majority of people believe in what they call, or what they understand to be, justice—at least as between others. There is no very great difference of opinion among civilized people as to what is or is not moral.

It cannot truthfully be said that the man who attacks Buddhism attacks all morality. He does not attack goodness, justice, mercy, or anything that tends in his judgment to the welfare of mankind; but he attacks Buddhism. So one attacking what is called Christianity does not attack kindness, charity, or any virtue. He attacks something that has been added to the virtues. He does not attack the flower, but what he believes to be a parasite.

If people when they speak of Christianity include the virtues common to all religions, they should not give Christianity credit for all the good that has been done. There were millions of virtuous men and women, millions of heroic and self-denying souls, before Christianity was known.

IN REGARD TO PERSECUTION.

It does not seem possible to me that love, kindness, justice, or charity ever caused anyone who possessed and practiced these virtues to persecute his fellow-man on account of a difference of belief. If Christianity has persecuted, some reason must exist outside of the virtues it has inculcated. If this reason—this cause—is inherent in that something else which has been added to the ordinary virtues, then Christianity can properly be held accountable for the persecution. Of course, back of Christianity is the nature of man, and primarily it may be responsible.

Is there anything in Christianity that will account for such persecutions—for the Inquisition? It certainly was taught by the church that belief was necessary to salvation, and it was thought at the same time that the fate of man was eternal punishment; that the state of man was that of depravity, and that there was but one way by which he could be saved, and that was through belief—through faith. As long as this was honestly believed, Christians would not allow heretics or Infidels to preach a doctrine to their wives, to their children, or to themselves which, in their judgment, would result in the damnation of souls.

THE RIGHT TO KILL.

The law gives a father the right to kill one who is about to do great bodily harm to his son. Now, if a father has the right to take the life of a man simply because he is attacking the body of his son, how much more would he have the right to take the life of one who was about to assassinate the soul of his son?

Christians reasoned in this way. In addition to this, they felt that God would hold the community responsible if the community allowed a blasphemer to attack the true religion. Therefore they killed the Freethinker, or rather the free talker, in self-defense. At the bottom of religious persecution is the doctrine of self-defense; that is to say, the defense of the soul. If the founder of Christianity had plainly said: "It is not necessary to believe in order to be saved; it is only necessary to do; and he who really loves his fellow-men, who is kind, honest, just, and charitable, is to be forever blest"—if he had only said that, there would probably have been but little persecution.

If he had added to that, "You must not persecute in my name. The religion I teach is the Religion of Love—not the religion of force and hatred. You must not imprison your fellow-men. You must not stretch them upon racks, or crush their bones in iron boots. You must not flay them alive. You must not cut off their eyelids, nor pour melted lead into their ears. You must treat all with absolute kindness. If you cannot convert your neighbor by example, persuasion, argument, that is the end. You must never resort to force; and, whether he believes as you do or not, treat him always with kindness," his followers would not have murdered their fellows in his name.

If Christ was in fact God, he knew the persecutions that would be carried on in his name; he knew the millions that would suffer death through torture; and yet he died without saying one word to prevent what he must have known, if he were God, would happen.

All that Christianity has added to morality is worthless and useless. Not only so, it has been hurtful. Take Christianity from morality and the useful is left, but take morality from Christianity and the useless remains.

KNOWN BY FRUITS.

Now, falling back on the old assertion, "By its fruits we may know Christianity," then I think we are justified in saying that, as Christianity consists of a mixture of morality and something else, and as morality has never persecuted a human being, and Christianity has persecuted millions, the cause of the persecution must be the something else that was added to morality.

I cannot agree with the reverend gentleman when he says that "Christianity has taught mankind the priceless value and dignity of human nature." On the other hand, Christianity has taught that the whole human race is by nature depraved, and that if God should act in accordance with his sense of justice, all of the sons of men would be doomed to eternal pain. Human nature has been derided, has been held up to contempt and scorn, all our desires and passions denounced as wicked and filthy.

Dr. De Costa asserts that Christianity has taught mankind the value of freedom. It certainly has not been the advocate of Freethought; and what is freedom worth if the mind is to be enslaved?

Dr. De Costa knows that millions have been sacrificed in their efforts to be free; that is, millions have been sacrificed for exercising their freedom as against the church.

It is not true that the church "has taught and established the fact of human brotherhood." This has been the result of a civilization to which Christianity itself has been hostile.

Can we prove that "the church established human brotherhood" by banishing the Jews from Spain? by driving out the Moors? by the tortures of the Inquisition? by butchering the Covenanters of Scotland? by the burning of Bruno and Servetus? by the persecution of the Irish? by whipping and hanging Quakers in New England? by the slave trade? and by the hundreds of wars waged in the name of Christ?

We all know that the Bible upholds slavery in its very worst and most cruel form; and how it can be said that a religion founded upon a Bible that upholds the institution of slavery, has taught and established the fact of human brotherhood, is beyond my imagination to conceive.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Neither do I think it true that "we are indebted to Christianity for the advancement of scienee, art, philosophy, letters, and learning."

I cheerfully admit that we are indebted to Christianity for some learning, and that the human mind has been developed by the discussion of the absurdities of superstition. Certainly millions and millions have had what might be called mental exercise, and their minds may have been somewhat broadened by the examination, even, of these absurdities, contradictions, and impossibilities. The church was not the friend of science or learning when it burnt Vanini for writing his "Dialogues Concerning Nature." What shall we say of the "Index Expurgatorius?" For hundreds of years all books of any particular value were placed on the "Index" and good Catholics forbidden to read them. Was this in favor of science and learning?

That we are indebted to Christianity for the advancement of science seems absurd. What science? Christianity was certainly the enemy of astronomy, and I believe that it was Mr. Draper who said that astronomy took her revenge, so that not a star that glitters in all the heavens bears a Christian name!

Can it be said that the church has been the friend of geology, or of any true philosophy? Let me show how this is impossible.

The church accepts the Bible as an inspired book. Then the only object is to find its meaning, and if that meaning is opposed to any result that the human mind may have reached, the meaning stands and the result reached by the mind must be abandoned.

For hundreds of years the Bible was the standard, and whenever anything was asserted in any science contrary to the Bible, the church immediately denounced the scientist. I admit the standard has been changed, and ministers are very busy, not trying to show that science does not agree with the Bible, but that the Bible agrees with science.

Certainly Christianity has done little for art. The early Christians destroyed all the marbles of Greece and Rome upon which they could lay their violent hands; and nothing has been produced by the Christian world equal to the fragments that were accidentally preserved. There have been many artists who were Christians; but they were not artists because they were Christians; because there have been many Christians who were not artists. It cannot be said that art is born of any creed. The mode of expression may be determined, and probably is to a certain degree, by the belief of the artist; but not his artistic perception and feeling.

GALILEO AND KEPLER.

So, Galileo did not make his discoveries because he was a Christian, but in spite of it. His Bible was the other way and so was his creed. Consequently, they could not, by any possibility, have assisted him. Kepler did not discover or announce what are known as the "Three Laws" because he was a Christian; but as I said about Galileo, in spite of his creed.

Every Christian who has really found out and demonstrated and clung to a fact inconsistent with the absolute inspiration of the scriptures, has done so certainly without the assistance of his creed.

Let me illustrate this. When our ancestors were burning each other to please God; when they were ready to destroy a man with sword and flame for teaching the rotundity of the world, the Moors in Spain were teaching geography to their children with brass globes. So, too, they had observatories and knew something of the orbits of the stars.

They did not find out these things because they were Mohammedans, nor on account of their belief in the impossible. They were far beyond the Christians, intellectually, and it has been very poetically said by Mrs. Browning that "Science was thrust into the brain of Europe on the point of a Moorish lance."

From the Arabs we got our numerals, making mathematics of the higher branches practical. We also got from them the art of making cotton paper, which is almost at the foundation of modern intelligence. We learned from them to make cotton cloth, making cleanliness possible in Christendom.

So, from among people of different religions, we have learned many useful things; but they did not discover them on account of their religion.

It will not do to say that the religion of Greece was true because the Greeks were the greatest sculptors. Neither is it an argument in favor of monarchy that Shakspere, the greatest of men, was born and lived in a monarchy.

DR. DE COSTA'S MISTAKE.

Dr. De Costa takes one of the effects of a general cause or of a vast number of causes, and makes it the cause, not only of other effects, but of the general cause. He seems to think that all events for many centuries, and especially all the good ones, were caused by Christianity.

As a matter of fact the civilization of our time is the result of countless causes with which Christianity had little to do, except by way of hindrance.

Does the doctor think that the material progress of the world was caused by this passage—"Take no thought for the morrow?"

Does he seriously insist that the wealth of Christendom rests on this inspired declaration: "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven?"

DOCTOR PETERS.

The Rev. Dr. Peters, in answer, takes the ground that the Bible has produced the richest and most varied literature the world has ever seen.

This, I think, is hardly true. Has not most of modern literature been produced in spite of the Bible? Did not Christians, for many generations, take the ground that the Bible was the only important book, and that books differing from the Bible should be destroyed?

If Christianity—Catholic and Protestant—could have had its way, the works of Voltaire, Spinoza, Hume, Paine, Humboldt, Darwin, Haeckel, Spencer, Comte, Huxley, Tyndall, Draper, Goethe, Gibbon, Buckle, and Buchner, would not have been published. In short, the philosophy that enlightens, and the fiction that enriches the brain, would not exist.

The greatest literature the world has ever seen is, in my judgment, the poetic—the dramatic; that is to say, the literature of fiction in its widest sense. Certainly, if the church could have had control, the plays of Shakspere never would have been written; the literature of the stage could not have existed; most works of fiction, and nearly all poetry, would have perished in the brain. So I think it hardly fair to say that "the Bible has produced the richest and most varied literature the world has ever seen."

Thousands of theological books have been written on thousands of questions of no possible importance. Libraries have been printed on subjects not worth discussing—not worth thinking about—and that will, in a few years, be regarded as puerile by the whole world.

GIRARD AND LICK.

Mr. Peters in his enthusiasm asks this question: "Who raised our great institutions of learning? Infidels never a stone of them."

Stephen Girard founded the best institution of learning, the best charity, the noblest ever founded in this or any other land; and under the roof built by his wisdom and his wealth many thousands of orphans have been reared, clothed, fed, and educated, not only in books, but in avocations, and become happy and useful citizens. Under his will there has been distributed to the poor fuel to the value of more than $500,000; and this distribution goes on year after year.

One of the best observatories in the world was built by the generosity of James Lick, an Infidel. I call attention to these two cases simply to show that the gentleman is mistaken, and that he was somewhat carried away by his zeal.

So, too, Mr. Peters takes the ground that "we are indebted to Christianity for our chronology."

According to Christianity this world has been peopled about six thousand years. Christian chronology gives the age of the first man, and then gives the line from father to son down to the flood, and from the flood down to the coming of Christ, showing that men have been upon the earth only about six thousand years. This chronology is infinitely absurd, and I do not believe that there is an intelligent, well-educated Christian in the world, having examined the subject, who will say that the Christian chronology is correct.

Neither can it, I think, truthfully be said that "we are indebted to Christianity for the continuation of history." The best modern historians of whom I have any knowledge are Voltaire, Hume, Gibbon, Buckle, and Draper.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

Neither can I admit that "we are indebted to Christianity for natural philosophy."

I do not deny that some natural philosophers have also been Christians, or, rather, that some Christians have been natural philosophers to the extent that their Christianity permitted. But Lamarck and Humboldt and Darwin and Spencer and Haeckel and Huxley and Tyndall have done far more for natural philosophy than they have for orthodox religion.

Whoever believes in the miraculous must be the enemy of natural philosophy. To him there is something above nature, liable to interfere with nature. Such a man has two classes of ideas in his mind, each inconsistent with the other. To the extent that he believes in the supernatural he is incapacitated from dealing with the natural, and to that extent fails to be a philosopher. Philosophy does not include the caprice of the infinite. It is founded on the absolute integrity and invariability of nature.

Neither do I agree with the reverend gentleman when he says that "we are indebted to Christianity for our knowledge of philology."

The church taught for a long time that Hebrew was the first language, and that other languages had been derived from that; and for hundreds and hundreds of years the efforts of philologists were arrested simply because they started with that absurd assumption and believed in the tower of Babel.

Christianity cannot now take the credit for "metaphysical research." It has always been the enemy of metaphysical research. It never has said to any human being "Think." It always said "Hear." It does not ask anybody to investigate. It lays down certain doctrines as absolutely true, and, instead of asking investigation, it threatens every investigator with eternal pain. Metaphysical research is destroying what has been called Christianity, and Christians have always feared it.

This gentleman makes another mistake, and a very common one. This is his argument: Christian countries are the most intelligent; therefore, they owe that intelligence to Christianity. Then the next step is taken. Christianity, being the best, having produced these results, must have been of divine origin.

Let us see what this proves. There was a time when Egypt was the first nation in the world. Could not an Egyptian, at that time, have used the same arguments that Mr. Peters uses now, to prove that the religion of Egypt was divine? Could he not then have said, "Egypt is the most intelligent, the most civilized, and the richest of all nations. It has been made so by its religion. Its religion is, therefore, divine?"

So there was a time when a Hindoo could have made the same argument. Certainly this argument could have been made by a Greek. It could have been repeated by a Roman. And yet Mr. Peters will not admit that the religion of Egypt was divine, or that the mythology of Greece was true, or that Jupiter was in fact a god.

Is it not evident to all that if the churches in Europe had been institutions of learning; if the domes of cathedrals had been observatories; if priests had been teachers of the facts in nature, the world would have been far in advance of what it is to-day?

SOURCE OF PROGRESS.

Countries depend on something besides their religion for progress. Nations with a good soil can get along quite well with an exceedingly poor religion; and no religion yet has been good enough to give wealth or happiness to human beings where the climate and soil were bad and barren.

Religion supports nobody. It has to be supported. It produces no wheat, no corn; it plows no land; it fells no forests. It is a perpetual mendicant. It lives on the labor of others, and then has the arrogance to pretend that it supports the giver.

Mr. Peters makes this exceedingly strange statement: "Every discovery in science, invention, and art has been the work of Christian men. Infidels have contributed their share, but never one of them reached the grandeur of originality."

This, I think, so far as invention is concerned, can be answered with one name—John Ericcson, one of the profoundest Agnostics I ever met.

I am almost certain that Humboldt and Goethe were original. Darwin has certainly been regarded as such.

I do not wish to differ unnecessarily with Mr. Peters, but I have some doubts about Morse having been the inventor of the telegraph.

Neither can I admit that Christianity abolished slavery. Many of the abolitionists in this country were Infidels; many of them were Christians. But the church itself did not stand for liberty. The Quakers, I admit, were, as a rule, on the side of freedom. But the Christians of New England persecuted these Quakers, whipped them from town to town, lacerated their naked backs, and maimed their bodies, not only, but took their lives.

Mr. Peters asks, "What name is there among the world's emancipators after which you cannot write the name 'Christian?'" Well, let me give him a few: Voltaire, Jefferson, Paine, Franklin, Lincoln, Darwin.

Mr. Peters asks:—"Why is it that in Christian countries you find the greatest amount of physical and intellectual liberty, the greatest freedom of thought, speech and action?"

Is this true of all? How about Spain and Portugal? There is more Infidelity in France than in Spain, and there is far more liberty in France than in Spain.

INFIDELITY IN ENGLAND.

There is far more Infidelity in England than there was a century ago, and there is far more liberty than there was a century ago. There is far more Infidelity in the United States than there was fifty years ago, and a hundred Infidels to-day where there was one fifty years ago, and there is far more intellectual liberty, far greater freedom of speech and action than ever before.

A few years ago Italy was a Christian country to the fullest extent. Now there are a thousand times more liberty and a thousand times less religion.

Orthodoxy is dying. Liberty is growing.

Woman to the Fore.

Argument before the Naples Lyceum, Jan. 4, 1892, on the following resolution, viz.:

Resolved, That all the political rights which man possesses ought to be extended to woman.

MR. CHAIRMAN, AND LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The time is near at hand when no question will be considered too sacred to be brought into the arena of free discussion. It is the only way to do away with old superstitious notions and separate the true from the false. Witches were hanged and heretics roasted, until discussion, even at the risk of life, enlightened the people sufficiently to see the enormity of such barbaric acts.

As long as men are associated together the acts of each must be limited by the rights of those with whom we are associated. But in the realm of thought there is no limit. And whatever benefits humankind has a right to be discussed. Human welfare is the supreme good, and whoever opposes that is a traitor to his kind.

I am in favor of the largest liberty and the least restriction consistent with the public welfare. But it must always be borne in mind that in the exercise of our rights we must not trample down the rights of others. And to be secure in our rights we must maintain the rights of others as sacredly as we would our own. No man of acute mind and sensibility will deny these positions, unless the principles involved be applied to woman.

Politically woman is not a part of us. She is to be governed and hav heavy burdens laid upon her without her consent.

Robert G. Ingersoll said, "Woman possesses all the rights which I enjoy and one more—and that is the right to be protected." And he might hav added that he possesses the right to protect her, and that would hav made the list of rights equal.

I hav heard men who prided themselvs on their intelligence quote from the Declaration of Independence, "All men are created equal," and declare that woman was not included. As well pass a law against cruelty to horses and then draw the inference that men are at liberty to beat and torture and stone all the mares.

While I do not believe that woman is the physical or mental equal of man—because nature has put an eternal bar against such equality—at the same time I do not believe that the rights of men are to be measured by their power or weakness.

By what right is a woman hanged by the neck until she is dead, who does not believe in capital punishment, and who has no voice in the law?

An old widow lady owns a corner lot in a city which she has inherited. She rents a few rooms, perhaps, and that is her only means of support. A lot of men get their heads together and determin that a new system of water-works are needed, that some new public buildings are required, and that the well-being of the city requires various other improvements. And they proceed to make an assessment to pay expenses, and they decide that the corner lot of the old lady is one of the most valuable in the city and assess it accordingly. Though she may never use a drop of water supplied by the public—though the buildings and other improvements may not be of the least advantage to her—yet her property is assessed and perhaps sold under the hammer to pay for something which was of not the least advantage to her. Though her property is voted away from her—in all of this matter she was allowed no voice.

Here is involved the very pith and soul of the principle which our fathers fought against in the Revolutionary war—taxation without representation. There is no power of argument which can do away with the parallel. If the czar of Russia should levy a tax upon us without our consent, it would involve no greater outrage.

It may be said that when these men voted a tax on the old lady, they voted a corresponding tax upon themselvs at the same time, and voted for the public good. But suppose the men who voted the tax on the old lady should be divided, and one-half of them vote a tax on the other half. How long would they stand it to hav their property voted away without their consent? It would be found that there would be a terrible scramble to know who was going to do the voting. Each one would feel as if he ought to be the man.

To take the education and mental training out of the hands of the mother and allow her no voice in the public education of her children, was seen to be so great an outrage, that in some states women are allowed to vote in matters relating to public schools.

The mother must see a grog-shop opened on every corner, and see her sons dragged into the gutter, and is not allowed a vote to save them from ruin. She may beg, she may plead—her tears may fall like rain before the human monster who brutalizes her boys—but he shows his license—it has all been done according to law—which men hav made, and which men sustain, but where is woman's remedy? She may ask a drunken husband not to vote for such a law, but she might as well expect the odor of the rose to emanate from a polecat.

In the midst of trouble which has been forced upon her without her consent, she is entirely helpless. Hunger, poverty, rags, hav been entailed upon her by law in which she had no voice, and from which she has no escape.

When men could be imprisoned for debt in this state, a woman could be dragged away to jail—taken away from helpless children—put into a felon's cell—for contracting a debt, it might be, while she, or one of her children, was sick, and yet that woman was not allowed a vote to wipe such a barbaric law from the statute-book.

O my friends, when we hav wrongs and indignities heaped upon us—when we are driven to poverty and want by a power in which we can take no part and which is beyond our control—it is tyranny—it is the foulest oppression—even worse than that which our fathers resisted unto blood.

In this discussion I am actuated by no sinister motiv. I am pleading for human rights—for the privilege of having every human being possess all the political rights which I myself enjoy. And woe, woe to the man who will not grant as much. For if he withhold those rights from others, even the humblest and poorest, he knows not what day they may be withheld from him. There is safety only in maintaining the rights of all.

Let us hasten to undo these heavy burdens. Let us wipe the foul blot of the political inequality of the sexes from the statute-book at once and forever. Let us enjoin it upon our representativs to pass a law which shall remove this disability from woman and make her the political equal of man.

Perhaps I ought to say that I hav some little fear of the influence which designing priests and ministers hav over her. But I do not think that disastrous consequences will come from putting the ballot into the hands of women. I am in favor of it because it is her right. The experiment has already been tried with the most flattering results. Women hav voted in Wyoming for more than twenty years. They hav not compromised their innocence or grown brassy or boorish, as predicted. They are just as good wives and mothers, and they hav not tried to sever the sacred tie between husband and wife, but hav behaved themselvs with due decency and becoming decorum since becoming voters, as before.

Who can believe that a state of servitude and dependence is the proper condition to produce good wives and mothers? The man who is unwilling to extend to his wife or mother or sister all the political privileges which he himself enjoys, in my judgment lacks the essential elements of a true patriot and would never display the manly courage necessary to resist the encroachments of tyrants.

To say that woman will become hardened and coarse, that she will lose love for her children, that home will lose its attractions for her, and that she will only be known as a blatant politician if the ballot is put into her hand, has not enough of common sense in it to command the respect of the sober and thoughtful.

Where it has been tried it does not work that way. Woman does not seem to lose any of her loving or lovable nature. While she is left with all her nativ sweetness and purity, it has had a tendency to elevate and refine man, and take away a great deal of his outside, if not his inside, cussedness.

Miss Susan B. Anthony wrote to Mrs. Warren, of Wyoming, to know the inside and outside working of woman suffrage in that state. In answer she says she has voted there more than twenty years, and during that time has never known a woman to be annoyed at the polls. On the contrary, she says, we hav the most gallant gentlemen in the world. You see, it would not do to be otherwise; she givs as a reason, men must behave themselvs or lose the vote of the ladies. Is there not philosophy in that? And does it not hav a tendency to make men more respectful and dignified? She says women do not strive for office, but are quite willing to let the men fill the offices, if they are only good men. Thus it will be seen that it does not do to put up men of disreputable character. For not only the candidates, but the party putting them into the field, would be called to account—a point worth noting.

So far from being degraded by having the electiv franchise extended to her, she seems not only to maintain her own dignity, but to be bringing man up to a higher level.

Is it reasonable to believe that woman will be degraded by having the rights restored to her which hav been wrenched away by the hand of tyranny? Hav any people ever been elevated by being robbed of their rights? Is this the natural tendency? Is this the experience of the world?

There never was a human being robbed of his rights, physical or mental, who was not degraded thereby. Virtue and happiness can only be enjoyed to the full in a state of freedom. Oppression, like the fabled upas, is death to all who come under its influence. The poison is not only death to the oppressed, but it reaches with fatal effects the oppressor also.

It is said that three or four years in the prison mines of Siberia reduces a man to such a state of degradation that he loses all interest in country, home, or friends, and even himself. And that those who oppress him are sunk nearly as deep in the pit of degradation is shown by the way the Russians treat the Jews.

Anciently whole tribes went to war. Women and children were followers in the camp. All prisoners were butchered on the battlefield, except the beautiful young girls, who were portioned out among the soldiery. They served a double purpose, one of which was to be the slaves of their captors.

The Bible givs an account of a battle where the general was commanded to kill all the males among the little ones; the maidens "keep alive for yourselvs" (Num. xxxi, 17, 18). Bible expressions are apt to offend delicate ears, so I giv the meaning in decenter language than God is in the habit of using. What must hav been the condition of woman under such circumstances?

As before hinted, man was not more elevated. As must always be the case, the degradation of woman must always keep man from rising. They must rise or fall together. The fact of butchering little children on the battlefield shows that the men were sunk as low in barbarism as the women whom they outraged and enslaved. Both were sunk low in the pit of ignorance. The oppressed and the oppressor were equally degraded. Thus we are tied back to the ignorance and brutality of two or three thousand years ago. And to-day we regard woman with the same political insignificance which was engendered in a barbaric age. And we hav not yet reached that state of civilization which inspires us with sufficient manhood to lift from woman the political disability which an ignorant people in a murderous, brutal age imposed upon her.

Paul was a great character in New Testament times. He was an aggressiv, bold, bad man—sour, morose, tyrannical. He made it exceedingly uncomfortable for those who differed from him in opinion. He persecuted men with the ferociousness of a tiger. No good man will ever persecute for opinion's sake.

It is said that Paul never married. But the fact has slipped out, through the so-called early fathers in the church, that he had a wife, whom he never took with him in his journeyings, but claimed the right to take a "sister-wife" wherever he might be.

I would expect just such a man to degrade woman and subject her to man's influence and passions. He commanded her not to do many things. She must not teach; she must remain in silence; in short, she must be nothing and nobody, and must learn of her husband. And he gave as a reason that she was first in transgression. No name is more venerated among women than that of Paul; and no man ever did more to load her with clanking chains than he.

What we most need is a class of women who hav boldness and heroism enough to set their feet upon the teachings of Paul, and not accept as a guide one who only sought to degrade and enslave them. It is a curious fact that slavery is inclined to perpetuate itself.

When John Brown raised the flag of freedom in Virginia, he thought the slaves would flock to his standard by thousands. Instead of that they fought for their masters. It shows that oppression may be carried to such an extent that the last vestige of manhood dies out—all love of liberty and independence is lost.

Very few women know much about the government or our free institutions. This is a great wrong to them and to our children. We can but excuse their ignorance, when we exclude them from all participation in the government. It would seem that they ought to be brought into closest relations with the government, in order to understand the claims upon them and their duty and obligation to it. I am inclined to think if the electiv franchise were extended to them they would manifest a more lively interest in the affairs of the nation, and it would seem to me to hav a tendency to purge out a great deal of political corruption.

And it strikes me that children would get a great many more wholesome and useful lessons in regard to the scope and design of our government than they now do.

In all history there seems to be a strange relation between grand and progressiv nations, and respected and intelligent women.

Will we learn nothing by the lessons of the past? Is the experience of bygone generations worth nothing to us? What we measure out to others will be measured back to us again. If we would not labor under disabilities ourselvs, let us not impose them upon others. The spirit of the Golden Rule should never be forgotten. Our civilization can never rise above the condition of the mothers. If we make an effort to elevate and ennoble them, our work will blossom out in our children.

If you regard the mothers as only blanks in society, wonder not if your sons stand only as ciphers.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

Does Protection or Free Trade Giv the Most Employment?

A plausible argument in favor of our protectiv tariff is, that it "givs Americans more employment."

This is true, however, only in the sense that it necessitates more labor to accomplish the same results.

It requires, for instance, less labor to produce the exchangeable equivalent of a certain article than to make the thing itself. If free to do so, we instinctivly produce this cheaper exchangeable equivalent and trade it for the more costly desired article, thus saving ourselvs the excess of labor the latter would otherwise entail above the former.

But deny us this freedom to trade, and Americans are forced into the more laborious way of producing, directly, the thing itself, instead of its cheaper exchangeable equivalent, and protected (?)—only in exacting from their fellow-countrymen additional pay for their waste labor.

Thus, trade, like labor-saving machinery, by making labor more productiv, certainly increases the share due each individual laborer, as well as the sum total of labor-products. But protection, by lessening both labor's individual production and the sum total of its fruits, certainly impoverishes both the individual and the nation to a like extent.

It is not by restricting labor's production, but only by increasing it, that the size of shares can be augmented.

Aside from the factor land, all products are the result solely of two factors—capital and labor. All the protectiv tariff laws in the universe cannot add one iota to their productiv capacity. They can but alter the ratio of distribution between the two.

So, if our tariff laws encourage certain industries, and the investment therein of capital, by promis of larger returns, they must eventually take from labor what they giv to capital.

Not labor itself, but the fruit thereof, is the incentiv to toil. Hence, every labor-saving machine is welcomed, and its inventor honored, in exact ratio as the labor-saving effected is greater.

The world-wide fame of Fulton, Howe, Edison, and other great inventors attests this fact.

Yet many protectionists seem to consider toil a blessing and labor-saving a curse. To destroy every labor-saving implement, to dull every broadax, saw, and jack-plane, to annihilate every steam-engin, loom, and printing-press, and revert to darkest barbarism, would be but the logical conclusion of such false premises. For certainly the labor-saving effected by trade can be no more injurious than that effected by machinery.

But even protectionists recognize, to a certain extent, the advantages of this labor-saving effected by trade. For this we tunnel the mountains, bridge the streams, grade hills and valleys, and girdle the earth with a network of railways. For this we build the fleetest "ocean grayhounds," and tax to its utmost the inventiv genius of man to still further improve them.

And protectionists not only dare utter no word of protest against this, but they would actually subsidize our foreign shipping. Why, then, counteract by protectiv tariffs the improvements these grand inventions hav wrought? Why encourage trade by giving bounties with the right hand and simultaneously stifle it by protectiv tariffs given with the left?

The importation of foreign-made goods does not displace American labor.

Imports are purchased with exports.

Foreigners will not giv us their goods for nothing. If they did, we should be so much better off, and we may freely accept all the valuable gifts offered us without fear of being ruined thereby.

But, as they expect pay for these imports, that pay can be given only in the products of American labor. It cannot be given in money, for there is no international money, and, as we reject foreign coins, so foreigners reject ours. Even when we buy imports with gold and silver, they are exchanged, not as money, but as a commodity—bullion—being weighed in the scales just as any other metal is.

Gold and silver are valuable simply because it requires the expenditure of so much labor to mine and smelt them. Could they be obtained as easily, rapidly, and plentifully as iron, they would be worth no more than iron. So it is the labor cost, principally, that givs even to gold and silver their value. Hence imports do not displace American labor, even though bought with gold and silver. In fact, they necessitate the employment of American labor to create the products that pay for them. And as this cheapness of imports brings within our reach many desirable articles we otherwise could not afford to purchase, more American labor is thus given employment in producing the exports to pay therefor than if these imports were prohibited. To prohibit the exchange of goods that cost us less labor for those that would cost us more, is, therefore, as unwise as to prohibit the use of labor-saving machinery.

To arrive at truth on the tariff question, as on any other, we must systematically study and follow independently each leading line of thought to its logical conclusion before taking up a new one. By so doing, every other protectionist fallacy can be as completely unmasked as this one that "Protection givs Americans more employment."

D. WEBSTER GROH.

Breathedsville, Md., Jan. 25, 1892.

Two Judgments.

Bold Robert Ingersoll, they say,
And Deacon Churchman died one day,
And both together started out
To judgment on the selfsame route,
And came at last to heaven's gate
Where Peter for them did await.
And as this saint they came unto,
He questioned them and asked them, through
What good deeds done, or conquered sin,
They thereby hoped to get therein.

Quoth Robert bold, when thus addressed:
"Well, if the truth must be confessed,
As sure's I hope to be forgiven,
I never supposed there was a heaven;
And when my earthly paths I trod,
I thought, too, that there was no God.
I all hereafter did deny,
But did as I would be done by,
But for some things I used to tell
I think I ought to go to hell;
So, ope to me the gates of gloom
And I'll go in and meet my doom."

Then Deacon Churchman, he replied,
"My maker I hav ne'er denied,
And twice to church on Sabbath day
I went to sing, profess, and pray;
Sometimes three times, but twice at least,
And always joined in the love feast;
And of the tithes I paid my share,
And joined in Tuesday evening's prayer,
And swelled the contribution-box
To clothe our foreign mission flocks.
All worldly pleasures I did shun,
And never had a bit of fun,
For I, to plainly tell the truth,
Hav always kept myself aloof
From those who were outside the church
For fear my garments I'd besmirch;
So, take the bars of that gate down,
And let me go and get my crown."

To Robert, Peter then replied:
"Though with your tongue you God denied,
You owned him still within your heart
Where loving-kindness had a part,
And like the good Samaritan,
You served God through your fellow-man,
So walk in through this upper gate
Where he your coming doth await
To giv to you the crown you've won
And say to you, 'Thou hast well done.'

"And, Deacon Churchman, you who thought
A crown in heaven could be bought
Through paltry tithes and many prayers,
And buying trifles at church fairs,
And putting in the money-box
Much gold to buy the heathen socks—
Who much preferred to go barefoot,
Which their condition did but suit—
But strove not to allay the woes
Of paupers dwelling 'neath your nose,
Just walk in through this lower gate,
Where Satan for you doth await,
To take you down where you will find
Ten million more of just your kind,
Who've found that heaven's not gained through creeds
Or empty faith, but kindly deeds."

Our London Letter.

The work done so far by the Liberty of Bequest committee has not given a uniform degree of satisfaction to the English Freethought party. Mr. Foote, whose opinion on the subject is worthy of deep consideration, considers the steps proposed to be taken do not go far enough, and the measures intended to be submitted to Parliament will not be any good to the National Secular Society, and because it simply asks that it may be made legal to endow a trust for inquiry into the foundations and tendency of religion and ethical beliefs. The stumbling-block seems to be the word "inquiry," but I take it that if inquiry without limitation were freely permitted, no valid objection could be made to the most sweeping criticism of any system of belief. It would be more satisfactory to every section of Freethinkers if all their disabilities could be removed, but the committee has good cause to know that a more forcible measure would hav no chance whatever in the present Parliament, and probably many succeeding ones, and therefore it is more politic to "hasten slowly," feel the way gradually, and proceed step by step to gain the ultimate aim of our desires. Mr. Bradlaugh found it was impossible to carry out more than a fraction of his intentions, and came to the conclusion that "half a loaf was better than no bread." The committee would be only too glad to propose a comprehensiv bill that would meet with the approval of all Freethinkers, if these showed the slightest chance of success, and would be glad to receive suggestions and assistance from the entire party to that end. It is questionable even if this mild little bill will not meet with sufficient opposition to swamp it for the time being, but it will answer the purpose of a feeler, and enable us to distinguish friends from foes in the house of Parliament.

Mr. Robertson has treated the question carefully and fully in the National Reformer, and has also found the word "inquiry" a stumbling-block. He doubts whether such trusts are even illegal at this moment, but there is that doubt about it, and in the absence of any law on this subject, it is, I think, most advisable that one should be made. As matters now stand, it is uncertain whether a legacy to endow such a trust would be allowed to hav effect, as it could only be decided at common law, should a dispute arise, and the judge before whom the question was raised could decide it according to his own prejudiced ideas, and Freethinkers hav a very good idea how many judges would decide in their favor. It must also be remembered that to defend such a suit, even if it terminated successfully, would be an expensiv proceeding, and one that would require serious consideration before taking up; it might in such circumstances be more expedient to forego the legacy than fight for it, and the question of right would still remain undecided. It is an exceedingly difficult matter to please all parties, though this would willingly be done if it were anyway possible; for although all the members of the committee are not members of the National Secular Society they hav the interests of Freethought quite as much at heart.

"The Liberty Annual," recently published by Messrs. Watts & Co., is worthy of careful perusal, inasmuch as it is rather a curiosity in these latter days. It is the best epitome of the individualist party that has yet appeared, but quite powerless to stem the coming tide of Socialism. As far as I can understand the gist of the papers, the only idea of liberty is to allow those who can make the most successful grab to hold all they get with full liberty for the weak and unsuccessful to go to the wall; but as this is generally the order of the day, it scarcely requires a special work to show how to do it, unless the cleverest of the individualists are somewhat uneasy in their minds, and consider it necessary to issue a series of apologies. It is easily to be understood why aristocrats and plutocrats so strenuously stand up for such a description of "liberty," particularly as they mostly profess such fervent Christianity; but it is not so easy to comprehend the reasons why those who are neither one nor other ally themselvs to such a party. Lord Cardigan, who is one of these eminent friends of liberty, owns a slum in Chelsea, which is a disgrace to any civilized community, and other noble champions are ground landlords of equally charming spots. The description of liberty advocated by such champions is worse than the slavery of past times.

The National Secular Society's Almanac for 1892 is equal to former issues; there are various articles of interest and much useful information to Freethinkers. As it is the only English annual of its kind, it will no doubt find a ready sale, and the editor's heart will be gladdened by the clearance of the entire edition. J. D.

Hosea Ballou, seems to have wandered from the faith. As a rule, Christians insist that when one denies the religion of Christian parents he is an exceedingly bad man, but when he denies the religion of parents not Christians, and becomes a Christian, that he is a very faithful, good and loving son.

Mr. Ballou insists that God has the same right to punish us that nature has, or that the state has. I do not think he understands what I have said. The state ought not to punish for the sake of punishment. The state may imprison, or inflict what is called punishment, first for its own protection, and, secondly, for the reformation of the punished. If no one could do the state any injury, certainly the state would have no right to punish under the plea of protection; and if no human being could by any possibility be reformed, then the excuse of reformation could not be given.

Let us apply this:—If God be infinite no one can injure him. Therefore he need not punish anybody or damn anybody or burn anybody for his protection.

Let us take another step. Punishment being justified only on two grounds—that is, the protection of society and the reformation of the punished—how can eternal punishment be justified? In the first place, God does not punish to protect himself, and, in the second place, if the punishment is to be forever, he does not punish to reform the punished. What excuse then is left?

Let us take still another step. If instead of punishment, we say "consequences," and that every good man has the right to reap the good consequences of good actions, and that every bad man must bear the consequences of bad actions, then you may say to the good:—If you stop doing good you will lose the harvest. You must say to the bad:—If you stop doing bad you need not increase your burdens. And if it be a fact in nature that all must reap what they sow, there is neither mercy nor cruelty in this fact, and I hold no God responsible for it. The trouble with the Christian creed is that God is described as the one who gives rewards and the one who inflicts eternal pain.

There is another trouble. This God, if infinite, must have known when he created man exactly who would be eternally damned. What right had he to create men, knowing that they were to be damned?

So much for Mr. Ballou.

REV. DR. HILLIER.

The Rev. Dr. Hillier seems to reason in a kind of circle. He takes the ground, in the first place, that "Infidelity, Christianity, science, and experience all agree, without the slightest tremor of uncertainty, in the inexorable law that whatsoever a man sows that shall he also reap." He then takes the ground that, "if we wish to be rid of the harvest, we must not sow the seed; if we would avoid the result, we must remove the cause; the only way to be rid of hell is to stop doing evil; that this, and this only, is the way to abolish an eternal penitentiary."

Very good; but that is not the point. The real thing under discussion is this:—Is this life a state of probation? and if a man fails to live a good life here, will he have no opportunity for reformation in another world if there be one? Can he cease to do evil in the eternal penitentiary? and if he does, can he be pardoned—can he be released?

It is admitted that man must bear the consequences of his acts. If the consequences are good, then the acts are good. If the consequences are bad, the acts are bad. Through experience we find that certain acts tend to unhappiness and others to happiness.

Now, the only question is whether we have wisdom enough to live in harmony with our conditions here; and if we fail here, will we have an opportunity of reforming in another world? If not, then the few years that we live here determine whether we shall be angels or devils forever.

It seems, to me, if there be another life, that in that life men may do good, and men may do evil; and if they may do good it seems to me that they may reform.

I do not see why God, if there be one, should lose all interest in his children simply because they leave this world and go where he is. Is it possible that an infinite God does all for his children here, in this poor ignorant world, that it is possible for him to do, and that if he fails to reform them here, nothing is left to do except to make them eternal convicts?

REV. MR. HALDEMAN.

The Rev. Mr. Haldeman mistakes my position. I do not admit that "an Infinite God as revealed in nature has allowed men to grow up under conditions which no ordinary mortal can look at in all their concentrated agony and not break his heart."

I do not confess that God reveals himself in nature as an Infinite God, without mercy. I do not admit that there is an Infinite Being anywhere responsible for the agonies and tears, for the barbarities and horrors of this life. I cannot believe that there is in the universe a being with power to prevent these things. I hold no God responsible. I attribute neither cruelty nor mercy to nature. Nature neither weeps nor rejoices. I cannot believe that this world, as it now is, as it has been, was created by an infinitely wise, powerful and benevolent God. But it is far better that we should all go down "with souls unsatisfied" to the dreamless grave, to the tongueless silence of the voiceless dust, than that countless millions of human souls should suffer forever.

Eternal sleep is better than eternal pain. Eternal punishment is eternal revenge, and can be inflicted only by an eternal monster.

MR. G. A. LOCEY.

Mr. George A. Locey endeavors to put his case in an extremely small compass, and satisfies himself with really one question, and that is;—"If a man in good health is stricken with disease, is assured that a physician can cure him, but refuses to take the medicine and dies, ought there to be any escape?"

He concludes that the physician has done his duty; that the patient was obdurate and suffered the penalty.

The application he makes is this:

"The Christian's 'tidings of great joy' is the message that the Great Physician tendered freely. Its acceptance is a cure certain, and a life of eternal happiness the reward. If the soul accepts are they not tidings of great joy; and if the soul rejects, is it not unreasonable on the part of Colonel Ingersoll to try and sneak out and throw the blame on God?"

The answer to this seems easy. The cases are not parallel. If an Infinite God created us all, he knew exactly what we would do. If he gave us free will it does not change the result, because he knew how we would use the free will.

Now, if he knew that billions upon billions would refuse to take the remedy, and consequently would suffer eternal pain, why create them? There would have been much less misery in the world had he left them dust.

What right has God to make a failure? Why should he change dust into a sentient being, knowing that that being was to be the heir of endless agony?

If the supposed physician had created the patient who refused to take the medicine, and had so created him that he knew he would refuse to take it, the cases might be parallel.

According to the orthodox creed millions are to be damned who never heard of the medicine or of the "Great Physician."

REV. DR. TALMAGE.

There is one thing said by the Rev. Dr. Talmage that I hardly think he could have intended. Possibly there has been a misprint. It is the following paragraph:—

Who (speaking of Jesus) has such an eye to our need; such a lip to kiss away our sorrow, such a hand to snatch us out of the fire; such a foot to trample our enemies; such a heart to embrace all our necessities?

What does the reverend gentleman mean by "such a foot to trample our enemies?"

This, to me, is a terrible line. But it is in accordance with the history of the church. In the name of its founder it has "trampled on its enemies" and beneath its cruel feet have perished the noblest of the world.

REV. J. BENSON HAMILTON.

The Rev. J. Benson Hamilton, of Brooklyn, comes into this discussion with a great deal of heat and considerable fury. He states that "Infidelity is the creed of prosperity, but when sickness or trouble or sorrow comes he [meaning the Infidel] does not paw nor mock nor cry 'Ha! ha!' He sneaks and cringes like a whipped cur, and trembles and whines and howls."

The spirit of Mr. Hamilton is not altogether admirable. He seems to think that a man establishes the truth of his religion by being brave, or demonstrates its falsity by trembling in the presence of death.

Thousands have died for false religions and in honor of false gods. Their heroism did not prove the truth of the religion, but it did prove the sincerity of their convictions.

A great many murderers have been hanged who exhibited on the scaffold the utmost contempt of death; and yet this courage exhibited by murderers has never been appealed to in justification of murder.

The reverend gentleman tells again the story of the agonies endured by Thomas Paine when dying; tells us that he then said that he wished his work had been thrown into the fire, and that if the devil ever had any agency in any work he had in the writing of the book (meaning "The Age of Reason"), and that he frequently asked the Lord Jesus to have mercy upon him.

NO TRUTH IN THE STORY.

Of course there is not a word of truth in this story. Its falsity has been demonstrated thousands and thousands of times, and yet ministers of the gospel go right on repeating it just the same.

So this gentleman tells us that Voltaire was accustomed to close his letters with the words, "Crush the wretch!" (meaning Christ). This is not so. He referred to superstition, to religion, not to Christ.

This gentleman also says that "Voltaire was the prey of anguish and dread, alternately supplicating and blaspheming God; that he complained that he was abandoned by God; that when he died his friends fled from the room, declaring the sight too terrible to be endured."

There is not one word of truth in this. Everybody who has read the life of Voltaire knows that he died with the utmost serenity.

Let me tell you how Voltaire died.

He was an old man of eighty-four. He had been surrounded by the comforts of life. He was a man of wealth—of genius. Among the literary men of the world he stood first. God had allowed him to have the appearance of success. His last years were filled with the intoxication of flattery. He stood at the summit of his age. The priests became anxious. They began to fear that God would forget, in a multiplicity of business, to make a terrible example of Voltaire.

Toward the last of May, 1788, it was whispered in Paris that Voltaire was dying. Upon the fences of expectation gathered the unclean birds of superstition, impatiently waiting for their prey.

"Two days before his death his nephew went to seek the curé of St. Sulpice and the Abbe Gautier, and brought them into his uncle's sick-chamber, who was informed that they were there."

"'Ah, well,' said Voltaire; 'give them my compliments and my thanks.'

"The abbe spoke some words to Voltaire, exhorting him to patience. The curé of St. Sulpice then came forward, having announced himself, and asked Voltaire, lifting his voice, if he acknowledged the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. The sick man pushed one of his hands against the curé's coif, shoving him back, and cried, turning abruptly to the other side:—

"'Let me die in peace!'

"The curé seemingly considered his person soiled and his coif dishonored by the touch of the philosopher. He made the nurse give him a little brushing and went out with the Abbe Gautier.

"He expired," says Wagniere, on the 30th of May, 1788, at about a quarter past eleven at night, with the most perfect tranquillity.

"Ten minutes before his last breath he took the hand of Morand, his valet de chambre, who was watching by him, pressed it and said:—'Adieu my dear Morand. I am gone."

"These were his last words."

VOLTAIRE AN INTELLECTUAL AUTOCRAT.

From this death, so simple and serene, so natural and peaceful—from these words so utterly destitute of cant or dramatic touch—all the frightful pictures, all the despairing utterances have been drawn and made. From these materials, and from these alone, have been constructed all the shameless calumnies about the death of this great and wonderful man.

Voltaire was the intellectual autocrat of his time. From his throne at the foot of the Alps he pointed the finger of scorn at every hypocrite in Europe. He was the pioneer of his century. He was the assassin of superstition. Through the shadows of faith and fable; through the darkness of myth and miracle; through the midnight of Christianity; through the blackness of bigotry; past cathedral and dungeon; past rack and stake; past altar and throne, he carried, with chivalric hands, the sacred torch of Reason!

THOMAS PAINE'S DEATH.

Let me also tell you about the death of Thomas Paine. After the publication of his "Rights of Man" and "The Age of Reason" every falsehood that malignity could coin and malice pass was given to the world. On his return to America, although Thomas Jefferson, another Infidel, was president, it was hardly safe for Paine to appear in the public streets.

Under the very flag he had helped to put in heaven his rights were not respected. Under the Constitution that he had first suggested his life was insecure. He had helped to give liberty to more than three millions of his fellow-citizens, and they were willing to deny it unto him.

He was deserted, ostracised, shunned, maligned and cursed. But he maintained his integrity. He stood by the convictions of his mind, and never for one moment did he hesitate or waver. He died almost alone.

The moment he died the pious commenced manufacturing horrors for his deathbed. They had his chamber filled with devils, rattling chains, and these ancient falsehoods are certified by the clergy even of the present day.

The truth is that Thomas Paine died as he had lived. Some ministers were impolite enough to visit him against his will. Several of them he ordered from his room. A couple of Catholic priests, in all the meekness of arrogance, called that they might enjoy the agonies of the dying friend of man. Thomas Paine, rising in his bed, the few moments of expiring life fanned into flame by the breath of indignation, had the goodness to curse them both.

His physician, who seems to have been a meddling fool, just as the cold hand of Death was touching the patriot's heart, whispered in the dulled ear of the dying man:—"Do you believe, or do you wish to believe, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God?"

And the reply was:—"I have no wish to believe on the subject."

These were the last remembered words of Thomas Paine. He died as serenely as ever mortal passed away. He died in the full possession of his mind, and on the brink and edge of death proclaimed the doctrines of his life.

Every philanthropist, every believer in human liberty, every lover of the great Republic, should feel under obligation to Thomas Paine for the splendid services rendered by him in the darkest days of the American revolution. In the midnight of Valley Forge, "The Crisis" was the first star that glittered in the wide horizon of despair.

We should remember that Thomas Paine was the first man to write these words:—"The United States of America."

The Rev. Mr. Hamilton seems to take a kind of joy in imagining what Infidels will suffer when they come to die, and he writes as though he would like to be present.

For my part I hope that all the sons and daughters of men will die in peace; that they will pass away as easily as twilight fades to night.

ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY.

Of course when I said that "Christianity did not bring tidings of great joy, but a message of eternal grief," I meant orthodox Christianity; and when I said that "Christianity fills the future with fire and flame, and made God the keeper of an eternal penitentiary, in which most of the children of men were to be imprisoned forever," I was giving what I understood to be the evangelical belief on that subject.

If the churches have given up the doctrine of eternal punishment, then for one I am delighted, and I shall feel that what little I have done toward that end, has not been done in vain.

The Rev. Mr. Hamilton, enjoying my dying agony in imagination, says: "Let the world wait but for a few years at the most, when death's icy fingers feel for the heartstrings of the boaster, and, as most of his like who have gone before him have done, he will sing another strain."

How shall I characterize the spirit that could prompt the writer of such a sentence?

The reverend gentleman "loves his enemies," and yet he is filled with glee when he thinks of the agonies I shall endure when death's icy fingers feel for the strings of my heart! Yet I have done him no harm.

He then quotes, as being applicable to me, a passage from the prophet Isaiah, commencing: "The vile person will speak villany."

Is this passage applicable only to me?

DR. HOLLOWAY.

The Rev. Mr. Holloway is not satisfied with the "Christmas Sermon." For his benefit I repeat, in another form, what the Christmas sermon contains:

If orthodox Christianity teaches that this life is a period of probation; that we settle here our eternal destiny and that all who have heard the gospel and who have failed to believe it are to be eternally lost, then I say that Christianity did not "bring tidings of great joy," but a message of eternal grief. And if the orthodox churches are still preaching the doctrine of endless pain, then I say it would be far better if every church crumbled into dust than that such preaching and such teaching should be continued.

It would be far better yet, however, if the ministers could be converted and their congregations enlightened.

I admit that the orthodox churches preach some things besides hell; but if they do not believe in the eternity of punishment they ought publicly to change their creeds.

I admit, also, that the average minister advises his congregation to be honest and to treat all with kindness, and I admit that many of these ministers fail to follow their own advice when they make what they call "replies" to me.

GOOD THINGS ABOUT THE CHURCH.

Of course there are many good things about the church. To the extent that it is charitable, or rather to the extent that it causes charity, it is good. To the extent that it causes men and women to lead moral lives it is good. But to the extent that it fills the future with fear it is bad. To the extent that it convinces any human being that there is any God who not only can, but will, inflict eternal torments on his own children, it is bad.

And such teaching does tend to blight humanity. Such teaching does pollute the imagination of childhood. Such teaching does furrow the cheeks of the best and tenderest with tears. Such teaching does rob old age of all its joy, and cover every cradle with a curse!

The Rev. Mr. Holloway seems to be extremely familiar with God. He says: "God seems to have delayed his advent through all the ages to give unto the world the fullest opportunity to do all that the human mind could suggest for the weal of the race."

According to this gentleman, God just delayed his advent for the purpose of seeing what the world would do, knowing all the time exactly what would be done.

Let us make a suggestion: If the orthodox creed be true, then all people became tainted or corrupted or depraved, or in some way spoiled by what is known as "original sin."

According to the Old Testament, these people kept getting worse and worse. It does not seem that Jehovah made any effort to improve them, but he patiently waited for about fifteen hundred years without having established any church, without having given them a Bible, and then he drowned all but eight persons.

Now, those eight persons were also depraved. The taint of original sin was also in their blood.

It seems to me that Jehovah made a mistake. He should also have killed the remaining eight and started anew, kept the serpent out of his garden, and furnished the first pair with a Bible and the Presbyterian Confession of Faith.

REV. DR. TYLER.

The Rev. Dr. Tyler takes it for granted that all charity and goodness are the children of Christianity. This is a mistake. All the virtues were in the world long before Christ came. Probably Mr. Tyler will be convinced by the words of Christ himself. He will probably remember the story of the good Samaritan, and if he does he will see that it is exactly in point. The good Samaritan was not a Hebrew. He was not one of the "chosen people." He was a poor, "miserable heathen," who knew nothing about the Jehovah of the Old Testament, and who had never heard of the "scheme of salvation." And yet, according to Christ, he was far more charitable than the Levites—the priests of Jehovah, the highest of the "chosen people." Is it not perfectly plain from this story that charity was in the world before Christianity was established?

A great deal has been said about asylums and hospitals, as though the Christians are entitled to great credit on that score. If Dr. Tyler will read what is said in the British Encyclopedia under the head of "Mental Diseases," he will find that the Egyptians treated the insane with the utmost kindness, and that they called reason back to its throne by the voice of music; that the temples were resorted to by crowds of the insane, and that "whatever gifts of nature or productions of art were calculated to impress the imagination were there united. Games and recreations were instituted in the temples. Groves and gardens surrounded these holy retreats. Gaily decorated boats sometimes transported patients to breathe the pure breezes of the Nile."

So in ancient Greece it is said that "from the hands of the priest the cure of the disordered mind first passed into the domain of medicine with the philosophers. Pythagoras is said to have employed music for the cure of mental diseases. The order of the day for his disciples exhibits a profound knowledge of the relations of body and mind. The early morning was divided between gentle exercise, conversation, and music. Then came conversation, followed by gymnastic exercise and a temperate diet. Afterward, a bath and supper with a sparing allowance of wine; then reading, music, and conversation concluded the day."

So "Asclepiades was celebrated for his treatment of mental disorders. He recommended that bodily restraint should be avoided as much as possible." It is also stated that "the philosophy and arts of Greece spread to Rome, and the first special treatise on insanity is that of Celsus, which distinguishes varieties of insanity and their proper treatment."

"Over the arts and sciences of Greece and Rome the errors and ignorance of the Middle Ages gradually crept, until they enveloped them in a cloud worse than Egyptian darkness. The insane were again consigned to the miracle-working ordinances of priests or else totally neglected. Idiots and imbeciles were permitted to go clothless and homeless. The frantic and furious were chained in loathsome dungeons and exhibited for money like wild beasts. The monomaniacs became, according to circumstance, the objects of superstitious horror or reverence. They were regarded as possessed with demons and subjected either to priestly exorcism, or cruelly destroyed as wizards and witches. This cruel treatment of the insane continued with little or no alleviation down to the end of the last century in all the civilized countries of Europe."

Let me quote a description of these Christian asylums.

Public asylums indeed existed in most of the metropolitan cities of Europe, but the insane were more generally, if at all troublesome, confined in jails, where they were chained in the lowest dungeons or made the butts and menials of the most debased criminals. In public asylums the inmates were confined in cellars, isolated in cages, chained to floors or walls. These poor victims were exhibited to the public like wild beasts. They were often killed by the ignorance and brutality of their keepers.

I call particular attention to the following paragraph: "Such was the state of the insane generally throughout Europe at the commencement of this century. Such it continued to be in England so late as 1815 and in Ireland as 1817, as revealed by the inquiries of parliamentary commissions in those years respectively."

Dr. Tyler is entirely welcome to all the comfort these facts can give.

Not only were the Greeks and Romans and Egyptians far in advance of the Christians in the treatment of the mentally diseased, but even the Mohammedans were in advance of the Christians about seven hundred years, and in addition to this they treated their lunatics with great kindness.

The temple of Diana of Ephesus was a refuge for insolvent debtors, and the Theseium was a refuge for slaves.

Again, I say that hundreds of years before the establishment of Christianity there were in India not only hospitals and asylums for people, but even for animals. The great mistake of the Christian clergy is that they attribute all goodness to Christianity. They have always been engaged in maligning human nature—in attacking the human heart—in efforts to destroy all natural passions.

Perfect maxims for the conduct of life were uttered and repeated in India and China hundreds and hundreds of years before the Christian era. Every virtue was lauded and every vice denounced. All the good that Christianity has in it came from the human heart. Everything in that system of religion came from this world, and in it you will find not only the goodness of man but the imperfections of man—not only the love of man but the malice of man.

Let me tell you why the Christians for so many centuries neglected or abused the insane. They believed the New Testament, and honestly supposed that the insane were filled with devils.

DR. BUCKLEY.

In regard to the contest between Dr. Buckley, who, as I understand it, is a doctor of theology—and I should think such theology stood in need of a doctor—and the Telegram, I have nothing to say. There is only one side to this contest; and so far as the doctor heretofore criticised what is known as the "Christmas Sermon," I have answered him, leaving but very little to which I care to reply in his last article.

Dr. Buckley, like many others, brings forward names instead of reasons—instead of arguments. Milton, Pascal, Elizabeth Fry, John Howard, and Michael Faraday are not arguments. They are only names; and, instead of giving the names, Dr. Buckley should give the reasons advanced by those whose names he pronounces.

Jonathan Edwards may have been a good man, but certainly his theology was infamous. So Father Matthew was a good man; but it was impossible for him to be good enough to convince Dr. Buckley of the doctrine of the "Real Presence."

Milton was a very good man, and he described God as a kind of brigadier-general, put the angels in uniform and had regular battles, but Milton's goodness can by no possibility establish the truth of his poetical and absurd vagaries.

All the self-denial and goodness in the world do not even tend to prove the existence of the super-

Letters of Friends.

Can Do Missionary Work Now.

ROCKY RIVER, O., Jan. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Along the 1st of next March I expect to be in funds to send an express money order to extend paper and get some books, hoping the new Bible Picture Book in press will be out by then. I am more than pleased that the outside pictures on THE TRUTH SEEKER hereafter can be taken off and no damage done the reading matter. Missionary work is possible now without offending at first sight.

Yours sincerely, SILAS GLEASON.

Until the Millennium of Peace Is Established.

AUBURN, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am now almost eighty years old. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER seventeen years; could not very well get along without it, and shall continue to take it as long as I am able to peruse its interesting truths. My sincere wish is, that you may liv to publish it until the millennium of peace is thoroughly established and bigotry is banished from the face of the earth. I inclose $7.50—$5 for two subscriptions and $2.50 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth.

Fraternally yours, C. B. TUCKER.

That "In-God-We-Trust."

PARIS, ILL., Jan. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: My paper of the new year is a beauty and highly interesting.

I had prepared an article for THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to some economic opinions, but seeing Mr. Z. A. Gleason's communication in the December 24th number, I concluded to fully indorse the most of his views, and would be pleased to hear from him often on the industrial and economic subjects now before the people.

What do you think of the penny postage? We all of us here wish it to become a law.

As soon as I get hold of one of our divinities in whom "We Trust," I will transmit it to you in exchange for a Bible Picture Book. J. A. WALTHALL.

Cartoons Making Freethinkers.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Jan. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: There are some who say that the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER repel more than they attract. I hav tested the matter by keeping a dozen or more tacked to the bulletin-boards in front of my news-stand in this city for the last four months, and there is scarcely a moment during the day but from one to a dozen persons are feasting their eyes on those holy pictures. They cannot help but view the grand show, to save their souls. Now, if some Liberal will try the experiment in every city in this free and enlightened country he will find to his surprise that more people want to look at those pictures than ever were dreamed of. I wish the TRUTH SEEKER folks, including Heston, a long and healthful life and a happy new year. L. R. TITUS, Agent.

Indignation at the World's Fair Closing.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Dec. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me some copies of letters to members of Congress on the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. Inclosed find stamps for postage and $1 to assist in printing the same. If the Fair is to be closed on Sundays I would recommend all Freethinkers and wage-earners of all nations to resolve to stay at home and let the sky-pilots and their followers conduct the business to suit themselvs. I believe such a resolution coming from the Liberal-minded people would hav a good effect in the opening of the Fair on Sundays. Let us hav an expression on the subject. If the World's Fair at Chicago is to be opened on Sundays, I will subscribe liberally to build a temple for Freethought lectures and debates with sky-pilots. I shall want two or more copies of the Pictorial Bible; will order when ready for delivery. Giv us Heston's picture in front and a family record opposit, embellished. Yours for mental liberty,

R. BUTTERFIELD.

Profound Truths.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Jan. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am never able to get a new subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The church has everything its own way. It is the fashion—that is enough. Anything to be fashionable. If it is to act the fool, or proclaim one's ignorance, no difference, go with the crowd. Fashion, indifference to the good of others, and ignorance it seems to me will be the ruination of our country. My only hope is in the free school. The general diffusion of intelligence may save it. We read that Spain was once the leading nation of the earth, and luxury, ease, love of display, and pleasure-seeking destroyed her; and it seems to me that is to be the fate of this country. Intelligence, industry, and frugality will make a people strong, be it a family, community, nation, or one individual. But an empty idle dress-parade, be it church or lodge, does but little to develop either. MARY T. B. HUMPHREY.

Two Fools Who Say in Their Hearts, Etc.

SCOFIELD, UTAH, Dec. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Add to your list Mr. Thomas Lloyd, a new member of our TRUTH SEEKER family, and a genuin heretic, who has so far failed to "find out God." Being a new arrival in this place, I am unable to say how it stands for Freethought; but, being one of the fools who say in their hearts, There is no God, and always ready to say so anywhere, I think Mr. Lloyd and I can keep the fires of Infidelity burning. We hav another new arrival—a little jackass of a Methodist preacher. I do not know whether "Providence" sent him here to offset my efforts or sent me here to offset his. At any rate, I pay my hotel bills, while the Methodist sponges his material necessiti off those who are satisfied with the spir ual coin he pays his worldly bills with. If you will send a few pages from the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," I shall try and secure some more purchasers for that noble book.

M. P. BROFFET.

May Every Liberal Be True to Himself and His Cause.

MONSON, MASS., Jan. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to congratulate you for your able editorial in the last issue of your valuable paper. Every Liberal should do all within his power to remove those obnoxious laws which infringe upon the liberties of the people. Above all things, our mails should be secure and all private matter pass unmolested.

Accept my sympathy and support in your effort to keep the World's Fair open Sunday. I am located in an old Puritan center, but send me blanks and I will do what I can.

May every Liberal be true to himself and his cause by supporting those moral principles essential to the happiness of mankind. May you succeed in your great cause, and soon may the world behold the true light.

Error is mortal and cannot liv;
Truth is immortal and cannot die.

And as time has seen the progress of the past, ere another century shall pass superstition will hav passed into history.

Your Liberal friend, F. H. BALL.

Loss of an Estimable Man.

OXFORD, NOVA SCOTIA, Jan. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: It is with feelings of deep regret that I hav to inform you that Mr. John Robb, of Oxford, died suddenly of heart disease, on January 7th, at the age of fifty-eight. He was born at Valleyfield, province of Quebec, and at an early age went to the United States, where he learned his trade. Returning to Canada twenty-five years ago, he became manager of the Oxford Woolen Mills, then in their infancy, and by careful and judicious management and persistent energy he has succeeded in making them a name second to none. He was an ardent supporter of Freethought, and the supporters of Secularism here feel that by his death they hav lost a most estimable friend. His funeral took place on Sunday, January 10th, and was conducted by the Odd Fellows, of which order he was a member. It was largely attended by all classes, and even his most bitter opponents hav to admit that we hav lost a good citizen, a kind master, and a man of undoubted honesty and integrity. Hoping the cause of Freethought will still continue to prosper, and wishing you a happy new year, I remain, Yours truly, E. H. SCHURMAN.

A Pleasant Letter.

LAKE SHORE, UTAH, Jan. 16, 292 E.M.

MR. EDITOR: I am still well satisfied with the dear old TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston. It is no use talking, you cannot afford to dispense with his cartoons. They are indispensable, and I hope he is well paid for his services.

Since Dr. York was here in Salt Lake City the Freethought cause has collapsed and everything seems as dead as midnight. Dr. York was well thought of in Utah county and gave great satisfaction. If he comes this way again he will hav my support.

Through a friend I hav just received a copy of the cartoon book. It is one of the best productions to fight superstition with that I ever saw.

Long liv Watson Heston and THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav a grateful feeling and thanks to all the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER. May the noble TRUTH SEEKER and the Freethought lecturers now in the field be prospered. I shall do what little I can to giv them aid. But I liv in a county barren almost of Freethought material. Wishing you and those laboring with you in the office every success, I am,

Yours for justice,
H. S. BROOKS.

Each Wave of Truth Submerges a Lie.

ELKTON, MINN., Jan. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the papers that the Christians are having a terrible outpouring of the holy spirit in different parts of the country, fulfilling the law, for without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin. Ligh and knowledge is penetrating the dark labyrinth of ignorance and superstition with which man's mind has been incrusted from the remoteness of time. Theological scholars are becoming honest by force of circumstances. They can no longer antagonize truth, and make it appear a lie. Every wave of truth rolls over a lie and strangles it, and these truths are coming in such force and rapid succession that the preachers are driven to accept a more solid footing, letting go o the straw which can no longer sustain them.

Dr. Thomas and Lyman Abbott are shocking the sensibilities of the religious element by their new theology. They declare the Bible to be imperfect—that a man may keep all of the Commandments and then not be fit to enter the society of the citizens of New York, which we know is none of the best. To believe Genesis we must hav two minds, one for a religious standpoint, one for a scientific. I hope Dr. Thomas will visit St. Paul again.

Radically yours, MARTIN FLEMING.

The Bible and Mathematics.

Jan. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: John xxi, 25, says: "And there are also many other things that Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written."

The numerous clergy and their almost innumerable dupes are ceaseless and untiring in their efforts to convince the world at large that the so-called holy scriptures are, or rather were, inspired writings. But how is it possible for anyone to believe this when, as is proved by the above quotation, a portion of these writings are no more than supposition? It is impossible to get the two terms supposition and inspiration to agree. If they were inspired by God this truth comes home with great force, That God did not at that time understand the English language. But let us see how the verse quoted will look in the sunshine of mathematics. The whole of the ministry of Jesus Christ—if we accept Bible chronology—did not exceed three years. We will allow him to hav performed (for the sake of argument) one miracle every second of that time, deducting nothing for the operations of eating, sleeping, etc.; that every one of those miracles was written up (or down) and spun out so as to hav made a book that would occupy one cubic foot of space. We find by computation that there are in those three years 94,608,000 seconds. There are in one square mile 27,878,400 square feet. By dividing these sums by each other, we find that had this immense number of books been placed side by side they would not hav covered 3½ square miles. Great Cæsar's ghost! what an infinitesimal portion of the surface of the earth does this little 3½ square miles represent, and what a "whopper" of a "durned no such thing" does this one verse of inspiration tell! It is worse than the boy's tale of a hundred cats. Still, it is only a sample of the no-such-things that can be found in almost any part of the so-called holy scripture. Truly did Thomas Paine say that the Bible had been read more and examined less than any other book. My own Liberal ideas were not the result of reading Paine, Ingersoll, or any other Liberal writer. I got them by reading and comparing the Bible. And every day confirms me more and more in the opinion that there is no more of the "inspired word of God" in that book than there is in the rhymes of old Mother Goose. It makes God a liar, murderer, and debaucher of innocence, and Jesus Christ a bastard and a distiller.

J. H. LANE.

To Supplant the Bible in Our Penitentiaries.

ALLIANCE, O., Jan. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hand you the within $2—one for the Bible Picture Book, when issued, and the other to apply on subscription. We hav taken the paper since Mr. Bennett's incarceration, and are much pleased with it. It shows up the terrible monster of Christianity which intends to subjugate the progressiv minds of the world, but finds valiant foes in the many reforms and their advocates. And though the Secular Union has fallen short of its proposed usefulness, yet THE TRUTH SEEKER has still unflinchingly carried its aggressiv flag at full mast, and, we are sure, if supported as it deserves, will never surrender to any superstition, either ancient or modern, but will ever claim the right for all of mental freedom, without political interference. I must congratulate you on the improved dress of the new year's paper and its picturesque appearance. Long may it wave.

I wonder if I cannot find a place for my preserved copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other valuable Freethought publications which hav accumulated on our hands, which I thought were too good to destroy. Do you not think they would be valuable reading for people who are in the homes or in asylums, or even in the penitentiaries? I would be only too glad to know that they are doing some one good, and hope from this paragraph to receive an order or the whole installment, which embraces all classes of progressiv reading matter, Spiritualistic, Agnostic, Materialistic, and social reform.

Yours for the betterment of the race,
MRS. S. S. ROCKHILL.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As our cause needs truthfulness, I cannot refrain from asking Freethinkers to be more careful in their Bible quotations. Mr. Joseph P. Troyer asks, in your issue of Jan. 2, 1892, "Why does the Bible say that a bastard cannot enter the kingdom of heaven and then say that Christ went there?" Now, I declare that the Bible nowhere says any such thing. It does say, "A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord." I hav often heard the same remark made as Mr. Troyer made and hav called the speaker to rights. If anyone will take a good concordance and look at the passages cited in which the word "congregation" occurs, such a one will receive sufficient proof that "the congregation of the Lord" was simply the congregation of the Lord's people. Deut. xxiii mentions several other parties who were not to be allowed to enter (or become members of) the congregation, as the Ammonite, the Moabite, etc. Be careful, Freethinkers, that you hav the exact truth when you write criticising the Bible, or you may put a weapon into the hands of the enemy with which to blow out your brains or cut off your head. I here giv you a verse which should convince you of what I hav written above. Num. xvi, 3: "And they gathered themselvs together against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congrega- tion are holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them; wherefore then lift ye up yourselvs above the congregation of the Lord?"

Truth needs no such bolstering, friend Troyer. JOHN HUDSON.

One View of the Labor Question.

FOREST GROVE, Dec. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me space in your columns for a few candid thoughts? If I am too diffuse cut it down. I hav read every copy of Freedom carefully, and these thoughts hav been suggested by its perusal. All of your, or rather our, reform journals are telling of the "oppressed poor;" of the wealth being wrung from the sweat of honest toil; of the rich corporations who rob the "honest poor" of his hard earnings, etc., etc. Allow me to present the other side of the picture, and I will not giv a case I do not know personally. I know a man who was left an orphan, with no help only his own earnings after he was ten years old. At sixteen he began to work for wages, $8 per month being the amount he got. He worked a year and took the man's note for $80; having spent only $16 during the year. He kept to that rule all his life. His motto was, "Always save a part of what you earn." He came West, worked, saved a little all the time and put it at interest until he could buy a small farm. He married a girl who had worked in families—a disgrace, some think—and was not afraid to work. They worked and saved together, lived close, worked hard, and added a little to the place, until now at middle age they hav a handsome farm and every needed comfort. Would reformers call this land monopoly? And there are thousands of such cases. All our thrifty middle-aged farmers hav done the same. What ought they to do, divide with men who hav done nothing but agitate?

Another case. A young man married some time after this one. He was getting $80 per month After marriage his wife rented a lodging-house and she told me she made $60 per month clear of her rent. This went on for some years; then competition reduced his wages and her income; sickness came, hard times, finally death claimed the husband and father, leaving a wife and little ones almost penniless. Did a grasping monopoly do this? No. They simply lived up their means as fast as earned, dressed better than their employers, and put nothing by for that rainy day that always comes.

Another case. I knew a skilled workman who for years got his $4 per day; had good health, plenty of work, and a small family. Time went on; his wife wore $5 French boots, $2 gloves, $10 bonnets, nice dresses, etc.—in fact, lived at the rate of a $6 per day income on a $4 one. Finally the same "old hacking cough" competition comes in and reduces wages. They get poor and poorer, appeal to their friends for help, and now are so poor that the wife and children are obliged to work, and work hard, to liv at all. Was this the fault of those grinding corporations? Were they robbed of their hard earnings? Not at all. They simply ate their pie first. These cases are legion.

And our reform journals and Farmers' Alliance men must simply begin at the other end of the row, and reform the "other fellow." Instead of blowing up the millionaire with dynamite, just blow up the other fellow with a little dose of common sense. Teach him, whatever he earns, to "save a little of it." That is the whole secret. Our reformers might say that even skilled workmen do not get enough to save anything. Well, it goes back to first principles again. What is his family doing? Are they wearing French gloves and boots, or are they willing to wear plain clothes, eat plain food, and put something by? No one begins with lower wages than the first case I gave you, and no one ever works harder, dresses plainer, or has fewer comforts than the farmer who makes farming pay.

Of course there is another side to farming and alas, it is seen only too often. The farmer buys land, perhaps on credit. His family must dress well; go to all the fairs and circuses that come along; keep help in the kitchen, a piano in the parlor for the girls; the boys must hav a horse, a dog, a gun, go to school and college, because mother says, "My children shall get an education, they shall never drudge as their father and I hav." Well, by and by a mortgage is put on the farm to keep the children in good shape, and when the gray hairs are shining thickly on the heads of father and mother the sheriff comes along and forecloses that mortgage and those old folks see dire poverty. Their educated, refined children cannot help them, for the simple reason that they hav been taught to look down on common labor, and hav learned nothing practical by which they can help their parents, or even support themselvs.

Not that I depreciate education, but I do very much depreciate the idea of teaching children they are too good to work as their parents did. That idea helps to produce our tramps and girls who will do anything rather than housework.

Giv a young man $25 per month on a farm or $80 per month in a city and ninety-nine out of one hundred will spend every cent of it, and curse their employers for not paying them more. I heard a book agent tell his own history. He said at one time he made as high as $10 per day. I asked him how much he saved, and he laughed and said, "Not a cent; I thought those times would last always." Well, he has a family now and is kicking the corporations and monopolists; but who is to blame? Please tell me, O ye reformers, who is to blame.

But why prolong the discussion? I could fill every page of THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten years with just such examples and only begin the story. Yours fraternally,

MRS. SARAH C. TODD,
Secretary Oregon State Secular Union.

"Over There."

Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: "If a man die shall he liv again?" This question is hoary with age, but has never been answered in the affirmativ to the reasoning mind yet; and, judging from the past, it will never be. The many systems of faith, beliefs, creeds, and isms hav their base on a pretended future life of dead humanity; and out of this hav grown the middlemen, or go-betweens, called magi, dervishes, priests, and mediums, to expound the rites, miracles, and mysteries of said systems. The crankiest "crank," the most fanatical "fanatic," find a following, and there are none so rich as to refuse them reverence.

Where did the idea of a future state of existence originate? As it is prehistorical, so rude and crude in itself, and believed in in some form by savages as well as by people claiming the highest civilization of to-day, we may well believe it goes back to some early progenitor of our race, whose first coat might hav been one of paint and his second one a plaster of mud. In the infancy of the race the struggle for existence must hav been continual; and where

Each for self the battle for existence must wage,
Kill, eat, or be eaten failing in the battle's gage,

the rude savage might hav pictured in imagination a time when a kindlier lot should be his, and where the climate was mild, subsistence easy, and where he could liv in ease and pleasure. So, when he died, he wanted his war-club and bow and quiver buried with him, and his friends to furnish him with some provision until he got a little start. In some countries they took their wives and slaves, and it was well to address the king with "O king, liv forever," which in evolu ion came to "The king is dead, long liv the king!"

In all time there has never been a patentable improvement made on this supposed deal in futures. A devil, with a hell and damnation attachment, has been run in connection, with some extremely high coloring given by the go-betweens, as they tightened their supernatural sinche on the credulous hopes and fears of their dupes. Is not the first idea the best?

So this belief in the "over there" has come down through the generations as an inheritance, and is bred in the marrow of our bones. Nearly every twig of us has had a personal bending also. It began at our mother's knee and has been supplemented by the Sabbath-school, the church, the school, and by books, pictures, mottoes, personal appeal, precept, and example; and if we are not all "cranks" of the first water it is because reason—which must be used on other things—has been just a little stronger than superstition with some of us. Thus the men and women of to-day, the best the world ever knew, seem incapable of overcoming this inbred inheritance and teaching of a future existence, but cling to it with that tenacity which a superstition almost universally inspires.

This state of affairs seems largely due to the Bible and the priests, who hav cursed all other teachings; and especially to the latter, who, with savage and brutal ferocity, assailed all who hav differed with them or taught other doctrins; slandering and defaming them through life and persistently following them with the same after death, and teaching their followers to do in like manner. In like manner this middleman has resisted any and all advance of humanity, seeking to rule or ruin all opposition. And to-day, be it said with reproach, the priest and medium still hold a "trust" on the living and the dead by which they rake in the almighty dollar.

The "middleman"—what a name for renown!
The bar on which we teeter,
No matter who goes up or who goes down
He's bound to beat the beater;
And, like purgatory, the middle ground
'Tween this world and some other,
Where all who pass must pay their pound
To fee their subtil brother.

If there was a reasonable proof of the "beyond," the middlemen would hav closed their shop long ago. Kept on the ragged edge of doubt and fear, never able to read their "title clear to mansions in the skies," unable, or unwilling, to break the chains that bind them, their blind followers, educated in a doctrin that fills them with horror and despair, go to a still blinder and designing priest or medium for an insurance on the "over there;" and walk up like little lambs and are shorn of their cash. Reason might dictate that options could not be secured on the future.

When once vows hav been taken, the doors to freedom and reason locked, and the emasculated victims sigh, "O to be nothing, nothing!" the degradation of fear for the future has reached its limit. The zealot is born again—the fanatic or insane asylum is next in order. This is called spiritual life; and the priest (which is the church) and the church (which is the priest) go into ecstasy over it. This soul-saving business is in full blast now all over our land. Even little children are frightened, persuaded, and coaxed into the church by old men and women who ought to know and do better things. O Reason, art fled thy throne and has Superstition usurped it?

As soon as these people get fairly born into priestly degradation, they are exhorted by their masters to be zealous in getting others born to the same conditions. No kind of life, however spotless and clean, suits the priest. You are a sinner unless you pay him toll. You cannot get to the glorious "over there" without going through his door and being born to his sweet will and paying for it, else you are a thief and robber. Every path is hedged in; repent, be baptized, or be damned—in this world at least.

We hav classed the medium with the priest as middleman or go-between, the regular channel from here to "over there." We are older than Spiritualism, so hav seen it spread rapidly over the world. It has been a power for good, not for its being true, but because it has freed the mind from old faiths and creeds, enlarged the views, and given a chance to grow in all things. Its growth and spread has been rapid, but Spiritualism seems to hav reached its limit, and is splitting into classes and will branch out like the old theology. Theosophy, of which we know but little, seems a branch. We hear of mahatmas and astral shells—whatever they may be—and doubtless it will soon hav its nomenclature and middlemen.

All assertions of a future state of existence must appear to a reasoning mind as without proof; and it is safe to say the millions of earth will pass away in the future, as in the past, and never a voice come back.

It is too late in the history of the race for a return to the stagnation of the Dark Ages. We must go forward, and swiftly too. Every generation shall see mystery, myth, and creed, and their believers go to dust; and in their place shall come a race mentally free. The pendulum of time is going to swing back and reason take the place of credulity. There are not a few now that are free from faith or belief in gods, devils, spirits, or the "over there;" holding them as assertions incapable of demonstration or rational proof.

Lips of love hav made vows to each other, with all the fervor manhood and womanhood were capable of, that the one that passed the bound of life first, if still in conscious existence, would make that fact known to the one left on this bank and shoal of time. It is safe to say no such assurance has come back, though we hav asked it with bared head in the presence of shining worlds with every fiber of our being.

It is equally safe to assume there is not, and never has been, a person with the unmistakable conscious knowledge they would liv after their heart ceased to beat. Imagination and desire is one thing; knowledge and proof quite a different thing, and the new time will no get them mixed.

The new time will eliminate the middleman. Supposed communications from the supposed "over there" will not pass through his office, but come to each person direct, if a all, and pay no tithes. Think of some splendid developed mind—say an Emerson—that has passed from life, but is still here and knows all that is to befall his dear ones, and wants to get an urgent message of warning of danger to them. Cannot do it himself; what has become of his individuality—his intellect and manhood? Well, but he cannot, and must huut up a medium—might be a frail one at the best, and liable to make bungling mistakes—and then hav to wait for some one to fee the medium before he could rap or write out what he wanted. Then it might be too late, or made to strangers not interested—in short, never reach its destination. The calamity comes, the loved one suffers all the agony life is able to endure; and he, wholly unable to prevent it, is plunged in sorrow, and despair as well, and awaits in helpless anguish the next disaster.

No scheme of a future existence has ever yet been devised that did not lower and restrict personal freedom and action, and show itself equally degrading to moral principle. If there is a life after this, why not one after the next, and so on eternally? None of us are responsible for being here—was it a put-up job to last forever without our consent? The most of the human family, by experience, come to ripe judgment before leaving this stage of action, and are fully competent to decide what is best for them; and should there be a future life they should know every condition attending it, and then hav the choice to accept or decline it. Less than this would be an insult to intelligence and reason.

This whole business is a matter of common sense. The coming man will stand erect with every faculty alert, ready to obey truth and reason, but pretended communication from a pretended "over there" must be personal. No God working in mysterious ways wonders to perform will be credited without demonstration; no paying of it all will constitute a lien on those who never agreed to such payment. Humanity will rise from its knees, shake off delusion and superstition, and make this life the best it can and accept the inevitable without fear.

When life's passions are over, and when by disease and friction the particles of matter of which we are composed are worn out, and lose cohesion and dissolve, to form new affinities, let us accept this as best, and the oblivion of rest as supreme happiness for the living and the dead.

How sweet oblivion's winding-sheet
To time-worn pilgrims with weary feet;
To reach the rest profound at last,
With all the burdens and sorrows past.

To feel the joy thus to be blest—
To know we fade and pass in rest,
To trust in Nature's high behest,
For all her works and ways are best.

ANDREW J. WADLIA.

natural or of the miraculous. Millions and millions of the most devoted men could not, by their devotion, substantiate the inspiration of the scriptures.

There are, however, some misstatements in Dr. Buckley's article that ought not to be passed over in silence.

The first is to the effect that I was invited to write an article for the North American Review, Judge Jeremiah Black to reply, and that Judge Black was improperly treated.

Now, it is true that I was invited to write an article, and did write one; but I did not know at the time who was to reply. It is also true that Judge Black did reply and that my article and his reply appeared in the same number of the Review.

Dr. Buckley alleges that the North American Review gave me an opportunity to review the judge, but denied to Judge Black an opportunity to respond. This is without the slightest foundation in fact. Mr. Metcalf, who at that time was manager of the Review, is still living and will tell the facts. Personally I had nothing to do with it, one way or the other. I did not regard Judge Black's reply as formidable, and was not only willing that he should be heard again, but anxious that he should.

So much for that.

DR. FIELD AND GLADSTONE.

As to the debates with Dr. Field and Mr. Gladstone I leave them to say whether they were or were not fairly treated. Dr. Field, by his candor, by his fairness and by the manly spirit he exhibited won my respect and love.

Most ministers imagine that any man who differs from them is a blasphemer. This word seems to leap unconsciously from their lips. They cannot imagine that another man loves liberty as much and with as sincere a devotion as they love God. They cannot imagine that another prizes liberty above all gods, even if gods exist. They cannot imagine that any mind is so that it places Justice above all persons, a mind that cannot conceive even of a God who is not bound to do justice.

If God exists, above him, in eternal calm, is the figure of Justice.

Neither can some ministers understand a man who regards Jehovah and Jupiter as substantially the same, with this exception—that he thinks far more of Jupiter, because Jupiter had at least some human feelings.

I do not understand that a man can be guilty of blasphemy who states his honest thoughts in proper language, his object being, not to torture the feelings of others but simply to give his thought—to find and establish the truth.

Dr. Buckley makes a charge that he ought to have known to be without foundation. Speaking of myself he said: "In him the laws to prevent the circulation of obscene publications through the mails have found their most vigorous opponent."

It is hardly necessary for me to say that this is untrue. The facts are that an effort was made to classify obscene literature with what the pious call "blasphemous and immoral works." A petition was forwarded to Congress to amend the law so that the literature of Freethought could not be thrown from the mails, asking that, if no separation could be made the law should be repealed.

It was said that I had signed this petition, and I certainly should have done so had it been presented to me. The petition was absolutely proper.

HE DISAGREED WITH THEM.

A few years ago I found the petition and discovered that while it bore my name it had never been signed by me. But for the purposes of this answer I am perfectly willing that the signature should be regarded as genuine, as there is nothing in the petition that should not have been granted.

The law as it stood was opposed by the Liberal League—but not a member of that society was in favor of the circulation of obscene literature, but they did think that the privacy of the mails had been violated and that it was of the utmost importance to maintain the inviolability of the postal service.

I disagreed with these people and favored the destruction of obscene literature, not only, but that it be made a criminal offense to send it through the mails. As a matter of fact I drew up resolutions to that effect that were passed. Afterward they were changed, or some others were passed, and I resigned from the League on that account.

Nothing can be more absurd than that I was, directly or indirectly, or could have been, interested in the circulation of obscene publications through the mails; and I will pay a premium of $1,000 a word for each and every word I ever said or wrote in favor of sending obscene publications through the mails.

I might use much stronger language. I might follow the example of Dr. Buckley himself. But I think I have said enough to satisfy all unprejudiced people that the charge is absurdly false.

EULOGY OF WHISKY.

Now as to the eulogy of whisky. It gives me a certain pleasure to read that even now, and I believe the readers of the Telegram would like to read it once more; so here it is:

I send you some of the most wonderful whisky that ever drove the skeleton from the feast or painted landscapes in the brain of man. It is the mingled souls of wheat and corn. In it you will find the sunshine and the shadow that chased each other over the billowy fields; the breath of June, the carol of the lark, the dew of night, the wealth of summer, and autumn's rich content, all golden with imprisoned light. Drink it, and you will hear the voices of men and maidens sing the "Harvest Home," mingled with the laughter of children. Drink it, and you will feel within your blood the startled dawns, the dreamy, tawny dusks, of many perfect days. For forty years this liquid joy has been within the happy staves of oak, longing to touch the lips of men.

I requote this for the reason that Dr. Buckley, who is not very accurate, made some mistakes in his version.

EULOGY OF TOBACCO.

Now, in order to show the depth of degradation to which I have sunk in this direction, I will confess that I also wrote a eulogy of tobacco, and here that is:

Nearly four centuries ago Columbus, the adventurous, in the blessed Island of Cuba, saw happy people with rolled leaves between their lips. Above their heads were little clouds of smoke. Their faces were serene and in their eyes was the autumnal heaven of content. These people were kind, innocent, gentle, and loving.

The climate of Cuba is the friendship of the earth and air, and of this climate the sacred leaves were born—the leaves that breed in the mind of him who uses them the cloudless, happy days in which they grew.

These leaves make friends and celebrate with gentle rites the vows of peace. They have given consolation to the world. They are the companions of the lonely—the friends of the imprisoned—of the exiled—of workers in mines—of fellers of forests—of sailors on the desolate seas. They are the givers of strength and calm to the vexed and wearied minds of those who build with thought and dream the temples of the soul.

They tell of hope and rest. They smooth the wrinkled brows of care—drive fear and strange, misshapen dreads from out the mind, and fill the heart with rest and peace. Within their magic warp and woof some potent, gracious spell imprisoned lies that, when released by fire, doth softly steal within the fortress of the brain and bind in sleep the captured sentinels of care and grief.

These leaves are the friends of the fireside, and their smoke, like incense, rises from myriads of happy homes. Cuba is the smile of the sea.

There are some people so constituted that there is no room in the heaven of their minds for the butterflies and moths of fancy to spread their wings. Everything is taken in solemn and stupid earnest. Such men would hold Shakspere responsible for what Falstaff said about "sack," and for Mrs. Quickly's notions of propriety.

There is an old Greek saying which is applicable here: "In the presence of human stupidity, even the gods stand helpless."

John Wesley, founder of the Methodist church, lacked all sense of humor. He preached a sermon on "The Cause and Cure of Earthquakes." He insisted that they were caused by the wickedness of man, and that the only way to cure them was to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.

The man who does not carry the torch of Humor is always in danger of falling into the pit of Absurdity.

DR. CHARLES DEEMS.

The Rev. Dr. Charles Deems, pastor of the Church of the Strangers, contributes his part to the discussion.

He took a text from John, as follows: "He that committeth sin is of the devil, for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil."

According to the orthodox creed of the Rev. Dr. Deems all have committed sin, and consequently all are of the devil. The doctor is not a metaphysician. He does not care to play at sleight-of-hand with words. He stands on bed-rock, and he asserts that the devil is no Persian myth, but a personality, who works unhindered by the limitations of a physical body, and gets human personalities to aid him in his works.

According to the text, it seems that the devil was a sinner from the beginning. I suppose that must mean from his beginning, or from the beginning of things. According to Dr. Deems's creed, his God is the creator of all things, and consequently must have been the creator of the devil. According to the scriptures, the devil is the father of lies, and Dr. Deems's God is the father of the devil—that is to say, the grandfather of lies. This strikes me as almost "blasphemous."

The doctor also tells us "that Jesus believed as much in the personality of the devil as in that of Herod or Pilate or John or Peter."

That I admit. There is not the slightest doubt, if the New Testament be true, that Christ believed in a personal devil—a devil with whom he had conversations; a devil who took him to the pinnacle of the temple and endeavored to induce him to leap to the earth below.

Of course he believed in a personal devil. Not only so, he believed in thousands of personal devils. He cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalen. He cast a legion of devils out of the man in the tombs, or, rather, made a bargain with these last-mentioned devils that they might go into a drove or herd of swine, if they would leave the man.

I not only admit that Christ believed in devils, but he believed that some devils were deaf and dumb, and so declared.

Dr. Deems is right, and I hope he will defend against all comers the integrity of the New Testament.

HOW DOES HE KNOW IT?

The doctor, however, not satisfied exactly with what he finds in the New Testament, draws a little on his own imagination. He says:

"The devil is an organizing, imperial intellect, vindictive, sharp, shrewd, persevering, the aim of whose works is to overthrow the authority of God's law."

How does the doctor know that the devil has an organizing, imperial intellect? How does he know that he is vindictive and sharp and shrewd and persevering?

If the devil has an "imperial intellect," why does he attempt the impossible?

Robert Burns shocked Scotland by saying of the devil, or, rather, to the devil, that he was sorry for him, and hoped he would take a thought and mend.

Dr. Deems has gone far in advance of Burns. For a clergyman he seems to be exceedingly polite. Speaking of the "Arch Enemy of God"—of that "organizing, imperial intellect who is seeking to undermine the church"—the doctor says:

"The devil may be conceded to be sincere."

It has been said:

"An honest God is the noblest work of man," and it may now be added: "A sincere devil is the noblest work of Dr. Deems."

But, with all the devil's smartness, sharpness, and shrewdness, the doctor says that he "cannot write a book; that he cannot deliver lectures [like myself, I suppose], edit a newspaper [like the editor of the Telegram], or make after-dinner speeches; but he can get his servants to do these things for him."

There is one thing in the doctor's address that I feel like correcting (I quote from the Telegram's report):

"Dr. Deems showed at length how the Son of God, the Christ of the Bible—not the Christ of the lecture platform caricatures—is operating to overcome all these works."

I take it for granted that he refers to what he supposes I have said about Christ, and for fear that he may not have read it, I give it here:—

And let me say once for all, that for the man Christ I have infinite respect. Let me say once for all, that the place where man has died for man is holy ground. And let me say once for all, that to that great and serene man I gladly pay the tribute of my admiration and my tears. He was a reformer in his day and an Infidel in his time. He was regarded as a blasphemer, and his life was destroyed by hypocrites, who have, in all ages, done what they could to trample freedom and manhood out of the human mind. Had I lived at that time I would have been his friend. Such is my feeling for the man. For the theological creation I have a different feeling.

I have not answered each one who has attacked by name. Neither have I mentioned those who have agreed with me. But I do take this occasion to thank all, irrespective of their creeds, who have manfully advocated the right of free speech, and who have upheld the Telegram in the course it has taken. I thank all who have said a kind word for me, and I also feel quite grateful to those who have failed to say unkind words. Epithets are not arguments. To abuse is not to convince. Anger is stupid and malice illogical.

And, after all that has appeared by way of reply, I still insist that orthodox Christianity did not come with "tidings of great joy"—but with a message of eternal grief.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

SUNDAY, February 14th, 4 P.M., in the Educational Gymnasium, 104 East 66th street, Dr. Ward will lecture on "The Preaching for the Times, or a Pulpit Up to Date."

NEWARK Liberal League, 177 Halsey street, corner of Market.—Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, J. W. Sullivan, associate editor of the Twentieth Century, will lecture. Subject: "The Unemployed, Propertyless Wageworker."

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

For the Little Freethinkers.

A SONG.

We are little men and women
That help to make the throng;
With Freethought for our motto,
And we are marching along.
Having been invited to the banquet
That should be shared by all,
We are for equal rights and Freethought,
Though the heavens break and fall.

We had no voice in coming,
But, obedient to your will,
We step forth and greet you,
And the place we hav to fill
We're bound to do it nobly
That our life on earth be long.
Children make a happy kingdom—
Don't you feel it in our song?

We all love one another,
And we keep the Golden Rule,
With equal rights for everyone—
'Tis the teaching of our school.
We've outgrown superstition,
With its night shadows of fear;
Don't you feel the inspiration
That the kingdom's very near?

Whene'er one yields to anger
Good sense is nearly gone;
But in fear is greater danger,
For then surely you hav none.
But we'd rule with love and kindness,
For compulsion it is naught;
Compelling is of blindness,
And with woe and misery fraught.

We are here to love and cheer you,
And we'll do the best we can;
Do not drive us that we fear you,
But closer draw the span.
Giv to us the wealth of freedom,
And we will not do wrong,
While we brighten up your kingdom
By the reason in our song.

Oh, join and giv us welcome,
Giv your voices in our song;
Let us feel we are progressing
As we are marching along.
Take our hand and giv your blessing
We will love you if you will;
Oh, make the gladsome echo answer,
"I will—yes, I will—I will."

The Paine Celebration in Boston.

You want me to tell you about it? Well, I will just giv you a light, brief sketch. The observance of Thomas Paine's birthday should always be made a grand affair, because we owe our liberty to his grand efforts. He was a great benefactor of the human race, and his special pleading, his noble work, made America what it is today—the freest, noblest, and best country under the sun,

Sunday last was a lovely day and the sun shone brightly on the memorial building in Boston dedicated to the great hero, Paine. A fine audience from the surrounding towns, the city proper, and some from long distances, made the hall as bright withindoors as the weather was outside. Everybody appeared young and happy. I do not know how it is, but Freethought people never seem to get old and decrepit. The years come and go, of course, but they sit as lightly on the brow of the mentally free as the downy plumage on the head of a bird. There are gray hairs, but they hav the luster of silver; some furrowed faces, but the marks are lines of beauty. And there are no dim eyes among Freethinkers. The eyes of the truly emancipated hav all the undiminished brightness of inquiry and reflection.

So there was a fine assemblage gathered together last Sunday to do honor to the memory of the "Author-Hero of the Revolution." The greatest enthusiasm prevailed and all were smiling and joyous. I cannot tell you what happened in the forenoon, for I did not get to the hall till the afternoon session. There was Washburn, Ernest Mendum; Mrs. Shurtleff, formerly Miss Mendum; Miss Lottie Mendum, and Miss Lydia Mendum, I think. Geo. N. Hill, who has lately issued another edition of "The Manual of Self-Respect," a little book that should be in the hands of everybody, for it is better than gold, especially for the young, though it will not hurt older ones to read it—he was on hand as happy as the occasion required. Meston, Foster, and Levi Meister and his bride, Mrs. Foster and the cunning little four-year-old Foster, Miss Mabel Washburn and her mamma, and Mrs. Sherman, all the way from Buffalo, N. Y.; Dr. Noyes, Dr. McDonough, Appleton, and Judge Robinson from Pawtucket, and Mr. Manchester. I must not overlook Mr. Babcock, J.M.L., with all the courtly grace and dignity of a duke. W. B. O. Peabody, too, was there—but it is no use, I cannot enumerate them all. The hall was filled anyway, with a gracious audience. By and by T. B. Wakeman came in and was applauded all the way up the aisle to the platform.

William D. Rockwood presided, and made an address, which was full of good thoughts. There was music by Poole's orchestra, and Poole I knew when he first began playing. The music was excellent. Mrs. Alice Mendum sang very finely. S. P. Putnam was not there, but his poem was, and Mrs. L. K. Washburn read it with fine effect.

Mr. Wakeman's address—I wish you all might hav heard it. It was a beautiful portrayal of the life of Paine from the last and best authorities. And then the glowing tribute to the "Two Freethought Heroes"—Seaver and Mendum—by Washburn, was tender, just, and true. The presence of these brave soldiers of Liberalism was missed, but memories of them were bright as burnished gold.

Fannie Allyn gave an original poem, sparkling, witty, and gemmed with real truths.

Then, something happened in the afternoon not down on the program. It was the unveiling of a fine portrait of Thomas Paine by its owner, Mr. Johnson, of New York. You will read the history of it elsewhere, so I will not attempt it here. But you should hav seen the audience gather around that fine face pictured upon the canvas and noted the admiration given to it!—the finest representation of the great-hearted man that has yet been seen.

In the evening there was another fine poem read by Mr. Washburn, and written for the occasion by Edith Walcott. Then came the address of your editor of the Corner, which we will pass. Mr. J. E. Remsburg came four hundred miles to be with us that evening, and his theme was Paine, the glorious and great, and it was an earnest and thrilling tribute. I was sorry to learn from Mr. Remsburg's lips that George, our valued friend and correspondent of the Corner, whom we all love, is not in good health. We are all sorry, and hope he may soon overcome the illness, and be strong and well. This world needs his help.

We hated to hav the meeting break up, it was such an enjoyable occasion, but the best of friends must part. It was with reluctance we said good-night and went our several ways. S. H. W.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

A primary teacher was giving an object-lesson on the word "transparent." She told the children that water and glass are transparent, because one can see through them, and then asked them to name something else that is transparent. One little fellow raised his hand in great ecstasy. The teacher said, "Well, Harry, what is it?" "A hole," shouted the boy.

Little Louie Arnold, aged five, before going to church was told by her mamma to be sure to remember the text, which chanced to be, "Why halt ye between two opinions?" On her return mamma said, "Louie, dear, I hope you remember the text," when Louie replied, "I didn't exactly catch what the minister said, but it was something about a hawk between two pigeons."

Obituary.

One signing himself "A Friend" writes: On January 18th there died at Oneonta, N. Y., Dr. Samuel H. Case, who was one of the most stanch Liberals in this vicinity.

Standing high in his profession and lacking none of the sterling requisits to manhood, being of noble and commanding presence, with a kindly smile for all and a large store of ready wit, he was, as might be supposed, a man of many friends.

He was fearless in his utterances, and when he engaged in discussing Freethought, Superstition, like a zoöphyte when an enemy approaches, shrunk to so small a compass that one might suppose it had left for its favorit home, the land of the czar.

The deceased was eighty-two years old. He had long been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and kept his Liberal literature always in circulation. It was in his office I first saw a copy of that dagger in the heart of orthodoxy, the New York TRUTH SEEKER.

Personal.

Liberals all along from Texas to Montreal are requested to note Samuel P. Putnam's route and write him for dates. Mr. Putnam has fairly won his spurs and stands pretty near the head of Freethought speakers. He has done a world of work for Liberalism on the Pacific coast, and Eastern Liberals will be glad to hav an opportunity to hear him.

Mr. John R. Charlesworth has returned from an extended lecturing tour West, and reports considerable interest in Freethought work in the places visited. His progress has been given in his letters, more of which are to appear. For the first trip of a comparativly unknown lecturer he won great success, and has invitations to revisit all the towns. He will go out again in March, beginning at Philadelphia, thence to Pittsburgh, and down to Columbus to arrange for the Ohio state organization.

We do not agree with Miss Ida C. Craddock, late secretary of the American Secular Union, in theology (unless she owns up that Mr. Bradford has set her right), but we hav ever borne testimony that she is as able and brilliant a young woman as can be found in a Sabbath day's journey—and now that she has undertaken to teach stenography by mail it can be safely predicted that she will be a good teacher for those who come under her tuition. She has converted the old Secular Union office into the "Columbia Institute of Shorthand and Typewriting," of which she is principal, where she instructs in person, and whence mail instructions are sent out to those unable to attend. The office is in the Bank building, Broad street and Columbia avenue, Philadelphia, Pa.

Arrangements for the settlement of the estate of J. R. Monroe, who died intestate, hav been completed, and the Ironclad Age will be continued with V. H. Monroe as editor. Mr. Monroe's is not a new pen to the readers of the Age, though he has hitherto used it anonymously. He has written much which has appeared in the Seymour Times and the Ironclad Age in years past. For nearly five years he was editor and proprietor of the Seymour daily and weekly Republican. Previous to that he filled the editorial chair on the True Republican of the same place. The business part will be looked after by Harry C. Monroe and Mrs. Power, the eldest living daughter of the founder of the paper. We extend to them all assurance of our fraternal regard.

The length of Colonel Ingersoll's reply to his clerical and lay critics crowds out of this issue the report of John E. Remsburg's appearance before the Manhattan Liberal Club on the 5th instant. His subject was "Bible Morals," and in its platform shape that speech is a great one to stir up Bible apologists, and the meeting was one of the liveliest in the record of the club. Mr. Remsburg is an indefatigable worker, and though for two weeks suffering from the "grip" he has spoken every night. From Boston he went to Lancaster, N. H. There he stirred up the churches amazingly. A Methodist deacon attended the lecture in order to reply, but at the conclusion all he could do was to gasp, "It's a cursed lie, a cursed lie!" The ministers took notes and are now busy "answering" him. From Lancaster he went to Portland, Maine, where his lecture was arranged for by our subscriber Mr. White. Thence he jumped to Saratoga, N. Y., then to this city, and the next morning he was off to a town a few miles east of Harrisburg, Pa. It will take him till March to reach Kansas, after which he contemplates a tour to Texas.

News of the Week.

IT is rumored that Italy will resume diplomatic relations with us.

ON Sunday, the 30th ult., "The Messiah" was rendered by the Oratorio Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., in spite of furious opposition by the clergy.

BLAINE has written the chairman of the national Republican committee that he is not a presidential candidate and his name will not be proposed for nomination.

THE bill introduced in the New York legislature by the liquor interest, to allow sales all night and on Sunday after 1, is denounced by Catholic clergy as an attempt "to destroy the religious observance of the Sabbath."

IN Berlin a locksmith named Lehmann at a Socialist meeting called Charlemagne an infamous and immoral monarch. A policeman pulled him off the platform and arrested him for irreverence to royalty, but at the police station he was discharged.

THE death of Cardinal Manning, the great English prelate, has brought out descriptions of him, which run much like this one: "He was a disciple of Christ who showed himself self-seeking, of fierce ambition, with passion for worldly power."

LORD SALISBURY on the 2d said: The first step of concession toward Home Rule will soon lead to others and "eventually place protectionist, impecunious Ireland in the hands of the priests, who, in all our quarrels with Spain, America, and France, invariably fought against us."

THE dissension in Long Island City, N. Y., as to whether a priest or a physician has the right to priority of admission to a sickroom, continues. Father Foley says, "The welfare of the soul is of more importance than the welfare of the body, and the priest should hav precedence over the physician in seeing a person in danger of death." Protestant physicians, he says, do not understand this.

AT the meeting of a committee of the German parliament, attention was called to the brutal treatment of soldiers by petty officers. Herr Senger asked whether the war office authorities, like the Clerical party, attributed it to neglect of religion in the army and the nation. Deputy Cingons defended the officers by arguing that the sovereign ruled by divine right, whereby he represented the deity, and this representativ authority passed to every officer holding the sovereign's commission.

THE United States minister at St. Petersburg says that fourteen million Russians are without food. Typhus fever produced by hunger is causing many deaths. Cold is making ravages. Houses are being torn down for fuel. In the province of Orenburg carcasses of men, women, children, and horses lie unburied in the houses and the fields. In many districts the population hav fled and desolation reigns. A traveler says that in one village no one had eaten for three days. The inhabitants of another village had taken the last sacrament together to prepare for death. Outlawry is increasing. Townsmen in many cases fear to go into the country. Houses are barricaded and guarded. There is expectation of a rising like the French Revolution, which was precipitated by hunger. In the belief that religious devotion will avert the anger of heaven, the people are increasing in fanaticism and in anger at Jews and other dissenters. The observance of Sunday is becoming strictly enforced. The clergy are employing prayers and many ceremonies to procure removal of the affliction.

THE emperor of Germany is urging the passage by parliament of the bill giving separate schools to each denomination, in place of the present state schools in which the teaching is but slightly religious. His objects are twofold—to conciliate Catholics, and to promote religion as favorable to monarchal rule. He has determined, says one account, "that every Prussian subject who is not a Catholic shall be a Protestant belonging to one or another of certain designated sects. He has resolved, in other words, to stamp out by statute the skepticism and Agnosticism which hav long been rife in northern Germany, and to enforce Christianity by act of parliament." One relater of this event remarks: "It is, as the kaiser has observed with some natural distrust, precisely the non-churchgoers who made the revolution of 1848, who extorted a constitution from the Hohenzollerns, and who throughout Germany hav steadily endeavored to substitute representativ for arbitrary government. The inference drawn by William II. is that a ruler of Agnostics is in a much more uncomfortable and precarious position than he would occupy if he could manage to convert all his subjects into Christians. This he knows would be impracticable as regards the men who hav already reached maturity, but he thinks that he can work his will upon the rising generation."

Gems of Thought.

WHEN a rustic sees a serpent ready to dart at him, he will kill it; when a sage perceives a bigot and a fanatic, what will he do? He will prevent them from biting. —Voltaire.

IT would be expecting too much from human nature to imagin that pontiffs who derived large revenues from the sale of the Agnus Dei, or that priests who derived both wealth and honors from cures wrought at shrines under their care, or that lay dignitaries who had invested heavily in relics, should favor the development of any science which undermined their interests. Moreover, other developments of thought in the church were hardly less fatal to the evolution of medical science. First of these was a wide-spread Egyptian and oriental theory, mainly transmitted through the Jewish sacred books, of the unlawfulness of meddling with the bodies of the dead. And when to this was added the mysterious idea of the human body as the temple of the Holy Ghost, and a dread of interfering with it lest some injury might result in its final resurrection at the day of judgment, there came an addition to the mysterious reasons which forbade men to pursue the study of anatomy by means of dissection.—Ex-President White of Cornell University.

THE conviction of the immutability of the laws of nature is the same among all unprejudiced investigators, who only differ in the fashion in which they seek to make this conviction agree with the traditional belief in the existence of a personal omnipotence, or intelligence, or creativ energy, or so-called absolute power. Both naturalists and philosophers hav tried their hand at it for a long time in many different ways, but apparently with the same unsatfactory result. Indeed, it was scarcely possible for these attempts at reconciling faith and science to prove successful, if carried on scientifically; for they either contend against facts, or trespass on the province of theology, or entangle themselvs in contradictions, or shelter themselvs behind an impenetrable obscurity. Thus, for instance, the famous Oersted, the discoverer of electro-magnetism, says: "The world is governed by an eternal intelligence, which manifests to us its workings as immutable natural laws." But nobody can comprehend how an eternal and ruling intelligence can be in unison with immutable natural laws. Either the natural laws rule, or the eternal intelligence rules; working side by side, they would get at loggerheads every moment; the rule of the latter would render the former useless, while the working of immutable natural laws admits of no exception nor of any personal interference, and therefore can never be set down as a system of government rule.—Büchner.

ONE of the faults of the Ghost as a writer is his tendency every now and again to drop down to the culpable level of a downright plagiarist. Certain of the points and passages which hav brought him literary renown are not his at all. The duke of Wellington was wont to allege that, to him, the Lord's Prayer proved the truth of the divine origin of Christianity. No one has a higher estimate of the duke's military talents than I hav. Perhaps few hav followed his career with more eager appreciation, from his first landing in India to the copestone of his life-work at Waterloo. I am interested in the reputation of his grace, and I sincerely wish I could link his name only with such landmarks in the world's annals as Talavera and the lines of Torres-Vedras. There is no sight more lamentable than that of a lion in his own special department voluntarily stepping out of that department to make himself an ass in the special department of somebody else. I should hav been quite as competent to hav led the British forces at Badajos as Wellington was to giv an opinion upon Christian evidences. Apparently, it had never crossed the mind of the great duke that what Christians call the Lord's Prayer is vastly older than Christianity. Evidently he had never heard that Christianity stole the prayer. His proof of the "divine origin" was based on theft. The Lord's Prayer is, incontestably, Jewish, not Christian; and, consequently, if it prove any "divine origin" at all, it must prove the "divine origin" of Judaism, the enemy of Christianity. Whatever the prophet of Nazareth may hav been, he was certainly far from original. The Golden Rule, the Lord's Prayer, and every sound and practical item in the ethical code of Christianity, existed centuries before Christ was born. The poor and semi-illiterate Jewish mechanic had had few educational advantages; but he seems to hav been pretty well versed in the doctrins of the Therapeuts and Essenes, and to hav perused portions at least of the Talmudic writings. The Paternoster is simply a slightly-garbled copy of an ancient Jewish prayer, known as the Kadish, and has, in toto, been stolen from the Talmud.—Saladin in God and His Book.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Can Freethinkers Organize?

On another page we print a letter Henry Frank wrote to the Sun in reply to an editorial note, and the Sun's editor's rejoinder. Mr. Frank, our readers will remember, stated his plans in these columns some few weeks since. He was formerly a minister at Jamestown, N. Y., but left the pulpit because his usefulness therein had ceased. For a year or more he has been in business in this city. He is a friend of Mr. H. O. Pentecost, and has been seriously grieved that that gentleman had to giv up his Sunday evening meetings, so much so that he has attempted by organization to do what Mr. Pentecost failed to do without organization. He believes there is an audience of Freethinkers in this city for every Sunday, and he believes they will support a lecturer if properly addressed. The initial meetings hav been greatly successful in attendance and practical support. Thus far the situation.

The question raised by the Sun is of tremendous importance. Is it a fact that Freethinkers cannot organize or coöperate? At first we were inclined to return the Sun's sneer, but on looking over the ground we saw there was too much truth in the assertion. The independence of thought which leads to Freethinking seems to destroy the power of cohering, compact organization. The nearest approach to it is the National Secular Society of England; but that was held together by the personality of Charles Bradlaugh, and to-day is kept in line by the ability of G. W. Foote; but it now shows apathy. The Positivistic societies of London are but a handful, and not increasing. In France, Spain, Italy, Sweden, Austria, Germany, there are local societies here and there, but of no great strength. In the United States there were once about three hundred auxiliary Liberal Leagues. Where are they now? The American Secular Union is the national organization, but that is for political purposes, though it has been used as a publisher of Theistic Manuals, and will now probably be diverted to maintaining the interests of so-called labor against capital. A few years ago it gave evidence of possible achievements, but latterly, beyond supplying its secretary with a salary and propagating Theism through its Manual—with which it has nothing to do—it has done nothing.

In New York city there is but one Freethought organization, and that is kept together through the efforts of a few. The Manhattan Liberal Club would go to pieces if it had to build a hall. The people who now talk so loudly from its platform would be heard no more. O. B. Frothingham's congregation became flotsam and jetsam when he inherited wealth and went to Europe. Felix Adler is maintained by the clannish spirit of his race and the fact that Jews are generous to themselvs even when they hav left Judaism. The Positivistic Society of Humanity has split up several times, and all attempts to get its members to working harmoniously hav failed. Mr. Pentecost had to discontinue his platform work because, while his audiences were large, they would not pay the expense of the meeting. Some of them evidently left the church to save pew-rent, as we heard his former treasurer say that six or eight dollars was all an audience of a thousand contributed—and some of that was suspender buttons.

Henry Frank is the last to try the experiment, which from a psychological, intellectual, and religious standpoint is of immense interest. Are the qualities of mind which make Freethinkers of so positivly negativ a character that coöperation for a given purpose is impossible? That he has got a tremendously hard task to reconcile the diverse intellects now gathered around him must be apparent even to him. Already one seceder has been found—his secession was because Mr. Frank compromised with some ideas with which the seceder had no patience. Will there be others like this one? Probably. Some will withdraw support because he says certain things; others because he doesn't. Henry Evans, a Comtist, said that it was as immoral and deserving of condemnation to think wrong as to do wrong. Mr. Evans has disciples in this city: their criterion of right and wrong is what they themselvs think to be so.

Mr. Frank's communication explains his philosophy—or at least it is intended to—for with the Sun we say these terms do not mean much. The phrase "pervasiv ethical energy of the universe" will not bear analysis from any but a pantheistic or mystical standpoint, and the philosophy of pantheism is as unprovable as theism. But Mr. Frank is more than his letter leads one to think. He is a Secularist, to use a word that has become sectarian. Of the same race as Professor Adler, he is as good a speaker, has well-developed business qualities, and can, we should say, do his part in the proposed organization. On the other side, it is unquestionable that there are one or two thousand Freethinkers in this city who want some lecture to attend on Sunday evenings during the winter. The theaters are closed to them, most of them do not care for concerts, they hav read the papers through, played with the children, eaten too big dinners, and they would like some place to go and take their wives. Churches they will not attend; they will attend Mr. Frank's meeting, but will they take more interest in it than in any other entertainment provided for them by private enterprise? Will they support it—pay for it? Would they help build a hall, or provide reading-rooms or recreation-rooms? Will they take any interest in it beyond the interest of amusing themselvs for an evening? Will they make it to themselvs what the church is to the devotee? Would they bear an unpopular pastor for the sake of the cause?

These are questions which will be answered by the success or failure of Mr. Frank's Society of Human Progress. Doing these things is essential to its welfare—to the welfare of any society. If he has to liquidate in the course of a few weeks there will be more evidence for the student that the qualities of mind which make Freethinkers are antagonistic to coöperation.

That Proposed Constitutional Amendment.

Mr. C. B. Reynolds writes us a few words in reply to our criticism of his recommendation that Liberals should aid the National League for the Protection of American Institutions—a Protestant association. He asks:

"What has the opinion of the members of the National League on other subjects to do with acceptance or rejection of this amendment which, while providing that no state shall pass any law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, positivly prohibits any appropriation of public money or property to any religious society, religious denomination, or religious institution, and further provides against any appropriation of public money or property—under any pretext whatever—to any society, any institution, or any undertaking that is wholly or in part under control of any church, religious institution, or congregation, that is not wholly secular?"

To this somewhat involved query we reply, Nothing. But does the amendment do all he thinks it does? It reads:

"No state shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly, or in part, under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

Mr. Reynolds quotes, to support his position, the definition of ecclesiastical: "Ecclesiastical (Gr. ekkleesia, a congregation, a Christian assembly, a church)—Webster defines it, Pertaining to a church, not secular." Mr. Reynolds thinks, therefore, that "this amendment declares that no religious society, or denomination, shall under any pretext whatever, receive any appropriation of public money or property; and further, that no institution, society, or undertaking, no matter whether it be religious or irreligious, sectarian or unsectarian, shall receive any appropriation of any public money or property if it is in part under the control of any church, religious society or congregation. Every line of the amendment favors the complete divorce of church and state and puts a stop to the great and crying evil of subsidizing any religious institution with public funds, a thing desired by every true Liberal."

Now let's see. The amendment prohibits—what?

Giving state money to a church.

Giving state money to a religious denomination.

Giving state money to a religious society.

Giving state money to any institution or undertaking, wholly or in part, under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

That is all. It nowhere prohibits the state from supporting an institution which shall be managed by non-sectarians in the interest of Christianity. For instance, it would not affect New York's attitude toward the Randall's Island House of Refuge, which is managed by a Board, not ecclesiastics, who use it as a means of teaching evangelical notions to the waifs and strays under their charge, to the great dismay of the Roman Catholics who furnish most of the waifs. This amendment would not prevent the state supporting the Refuge as it does now.

The amendment is aimed at Roman Catholicism, because that is so solid a sect that all its undertakings are under ecclesiastical control. Protestantism can easily circumvent its provisions, as it has done in the case of Girard College. That this is the intent, and that the amendment makes the thing possible, is clearly shown by the words of its supporters. Congressman Morse, of Massachusetts, says (italicizing ours):

"I firmly believe that public money should never directly or indirectly be used for sectarian purposes, and would be glad to vote for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Wm. Weir, of the God-in-the-Constitution party, says:

"Judge Story, in his commentaries on the National Constitution, declares that the language of the first amendment forbidding Congress to 'pass any law respecting a religious establishment,' did not mean to repudiate religion or degrade Christianity to a level with other religions, but to avoid a union of church and state, the evils of which were so well known. Using the same language, the presumption is fair that the meaning in this proposed amendment is the same, and that its purpose is especially to prevent all financial aid by the state, to any church or religious society. In this view of the case the National Reform Association has steadily advocated such an amendment. There is a cardinal distinction between religion and the church. Religion is a matter of principles, feelings, thoughts, duties. The church is an organized body of men. The state or nation must hav a religion, because it is composed of human beings, each of whom is by nature a religious being. If each unit is religious, the sum of them must also be so. And if religious by its nature, it must and will hav a religion."

Rev. J. M. Foster, another secretary of the same party, says:

"The proposed Sixteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is certainly a move in the right direction. By 'an establishment of religion' is understood 'a state church,' such as the prelatic establishment of England. To this we stand unalterably opposed. The state must hav a religion, but that neither justifies the prelatic intrusion of the church's prerogativs by the state, nor the domination of the state by the church."

Isn't it a little queer, if this amendment will do what Mr. Reynolds thinks it will do, to find keen advocates of a state religion also advocating it? But they know it will not do anything beyond preventing special denominations obtaining state funds—that is the burden of all the arguments of those who are pushing this movement, even of Rev. J. M. King, the general secretary of the League originating it. He says, "The proposed amendment will cut up by the roots the dangerous system of state and municipal aid to sectarian objects." That is all. Nothing about cutting up by the roots the system of state aid to religion!

The American Sentinel, a journal which sees pretty clearly in all matters affecting a partnership of church and state, says of this proposed amendment:

"If the word religious were substituted for the word sectarian in the last clause, the amendment would be as nearly perfect as things human generally are; but as it now stands, and as its framers and friends intend it, it leaves an open door for that colorless thing which they please to call unsectarian Christianity."

That is precisely what we said, notwithstanding the argument of friend Reynolds. Liberals can not afford to be decoyed into this League. It is a Protestant organization, working with all the subtlety of Jesuits against its old enemy, Roman Catholicism. It is jealous of the strength of Rome, of the money it gets, of the power it wields; and it proposes to get a limited divorce of church and state—that sort of separation where bed and board is not shared, but the divorced bride is allowed alimony, paid through a third party by the grass widower. And greener than the freshest grass will Uncle Sam be if he consents to any such proceeding.

For New Yorkers.

Freethinkers in this state are urged to array themselvs against the Sabbatarians.

A senator at Albany, Mr. Hunter, has introduced a resolution asking that the World's Fair be closed on Sundays, and in any event that New York's exhibit be closed on that day. This resolution is being supported by petitions procured by the American Sabbath Union.

We suggest that every liberal-minded man and woman in this state sit down at once and write something like this and mail it to Albany:

————, 1892.

TO THE SENATORS AND ASSEMBLYMEN OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—Gentlemen: Understanding that a resolution asking the World's Fair authorities to close that exhibition on Sundays will come before you; also, that you will be asked to legally close New York's exhibit on Sunday, we, the undersigned, herewith record our protest against the adoption of any such resolution, or the enactment of any law closing New York's exhibit on Sunday.

And we further ask, if the question of closing or opening the World's Fair at Chicago shall come before you in any shape, that you will vote to hav it remain open. We ask this for these reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one is disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is solely a humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and therefore the only standard by which you can decide on this resolution is that of the public welfare.

Hoping that these reasons will hav weight with you for good, and that you will ever be found on the side of freedom, I remain, Yours respectfully, ...

The senators and assemblymen of this state are as follows:

These remonstrances, or similar ones, should be addressed to senators and to assemblymen both. If you hav acquaintances in either house, send to them. If not, send to the ones who represent your senatorial and assembly districts. Senators should be addressed "Senate Chamber," and assemblymen "Assembly Chamber," Albany, N. Y.

We ask every Freethinker in the state to cut this out, paste it upon a large sheet of paper, obtain as many signatures as possible in his town, and forward it to Albany. It ought to be done in duplicate, so that both senators and assemblymen can hav them. DO NOT DELAY.

Make Them Recant.

The celebration of Paine's birthday has called out the usual number of calumnies upon that illustrious man. Colonel Ingersoll's eulogy seems to hav pained the clerical critics most. One of them, the Rev. Jay B. Hamilton, of Hackettstown, N. J., brings out again the old story that Paine died an agonizing death, recanting his Infidelity, and calling upon Jesus to hav mercy upon him.

This story will of course be repeated in the pious journals and by the little ministers all over the country, and we allude to it for the purpose of forestalling the requests to "answer" it. This has already been done hundreds of times, and so completely that the minister who repeats it now can justify himself only by pleading ignorance. Otherwise he stands convicted of dishonesty.

Some years ago Colonel Ingersoll and the Observer had a dispute upon this subject. The Observer did its worst. Colonel Ingersoll, however, had no difficulty in showing its claims to be pure falsehoods. Shortly afterward some one dug up a pretended letter by a Roman Catholic bishop repeating nearly the same falsehoods. This letter was completely riddled and shown to be a forgery by W. H. Burr. These attacks and replies were put into pamphlet form by THE TRUTH SEEKER and are still very much in print. We recommend that Freethinkers in every town where the calumnies of Paine are repeated send fifteen cents to this office for "Thomas Paine's Vindication," and with the facts therein obtained force the repeaters to recant.

We print this week the first part of Helen Gardener's new lecture, "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." It is a masterly arraignment of the Bible, especially strong on its treatment of woman, and will be read with keen pleasure by all heretical women. It ought also to be distributed among Christian women, and we hope it will be. In making announcement of its publication last week, Miss Gardener says we did her an injustice in saying we had difficulty in inducing her to "return to the fold," for she maintains that she has never strayed therefrom, but only been doing her chosen work off in another corner where she could get more listeners, and consequently do more good. She has been preaching to those who will be the grandmothers of the future in order that their grandchildren may be reformed. We accept the amendment.

The Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, is a more than ordinarily liberal-minded Unitarian, a good speaker, a scholar, with something of a reputation for reasoning, but for all that he said in a recent sermon: "Evolution, instead of teaching Jesus as an impossible kind of being—neither man nor God—teaches that he was the highest manifestation of the religious life on the earth—the divine in the human—the religious crown of the race up to this hour; God in man, reaching up from beneath, instead of God outside of man, reaching down from above." Did one ever see a more hopeless jumble of words! As a matter of fact evolution teaches nothing at all about Jesus. Evolution no more than gravity knows anything of a God, or the divine in the human (whatever that may be), or of any reaching up or down, from below or above. Evolution is not a substitute for God, but a law discovered by science. Such a confusion of ideas and words is disreputable in one who is set up to teach others.

It is commonly held by the clergy that all Anarchists are Atheists. Last week four of the latter were executed in Madrid for leading an attack upon the town of Xeres. They were all Christians, and the bishop of Cadiz endeavored to hav their sentence commuted, but unsuccessfully. Before they died all accepted religious ministrations, and one of them left a confession in which he said: "Ready to appear at the judgment seat of God, should my clear conscience set an example to others I publicly declare that I hav professed to my undoing the subversiv principles of anarchy. The misled Anarchist press takes advantage of the ignorance of the working classes to inculcate theories against justice and reason. I desire my comrades to know that the Anarchist journals hav been wofully deceiving us. I am convinced that many of those preaching doctrins to us are perfectly indifferent to our fate. I therefore advise my comrades to repudiate those teachings and be honest workers, with faith in God and religion, which teaches that all men are brethren."

My Lecture Trip.

Spending a few days in Cincinnati, I went on again to Columbus, arriving here on the evening of Thursday, the 7th inst. Upon my arrival I learned that nothing whatever had been done toward arranging for the lecture on the Sunday following. Not even a hall had been engaged or an advertisement inserted in any of the papers, and some of the friends had even gone so far as to declare the lecture "off." Under such circumstances the outlook was certainly far from cheering; but I at once decided to giv the lecture if I could possibly do so at all. So early next morning I went in company with J. B. Cochran and engaged a hall myself, and in less than one hour I had an advertisement inserted in two of the leading papers and five thousand dodgers under way of printing for distribution on the Saturday. It was Friday night ere anyone knew that the lecture would be given, therefore under such conditions we did not look for a very large attendance. I had determined, however, to make the best of it, and leave no stone unturned that would add to the success of our meeting. I wrote private letters to some of the leading Freethinkers in the city. This, together with a personal canvass of as many as possible, resulted in a splendid audience, so that I felt amply rewarded for my efforts. By 8 o'clock there were scarcely a dozen empty seats in the hall, and this the result of but two days' work.

The Freethinkers of Columbus should hav good hopes of a good and successful organization in their own locality, would they only display a little enthusiasm and energy in the movement.

One gentleman—whose name I now forget—came from Upper Sandusky, a distance of sixty miles, purposely to hear my lecture, and many others came from shorter distances in the country. Everyone expressed entire satisfaction at the result and uttered a devout wish that the meetings would continue. A good debate took place after the lecture, which made the meeting more attractiv, and added somewhat to its interest. Several of those present indulged in the discussion, among them being two Christian gentlemen, who ventured upon a little criticism, one of whom declared that this was the best meeting he had ever attended in his life. At the close of the meeting our Freethought friends rallied to my support and went down into their pockets to refund to me the expenses that I had incurred in arranging the lecture. F. S. Montgomery, of Shepard Station, presided, and by his earnestness infused a little enthusiasm into those present; he is quite a young man, but has sufficient strength in the faith for a score, and I must certainly express my thanks to him for the manner in which he came to my assistance. A general talk took place concerning the mass-meeting to be held in this city on the 3d of April next, when the Ohio State Secular Union shall be organized. All were in hearty sympathy with the movement, and expressed a determination to see it successfully carried out. Columbus has quite a number of well-to-do Liberals, who will help us in the work of state organization, and every Freethinker in the state of Ohio to whom I hav yet spoken has expressed his approval of such a scheme. State organization is undoubtedly the only method by which Freethinkers can be successfully organized for any practical purpose, and it is to be hoped that as many of our friends as can possibly do so will giv us their assistance in this matter. S. P. Putnam has indeed truly stated that "each state has its own independent issues, and its own independent work to perform."

Freethought organizations are an absolute necessity if we wish to meet these issues and perform this work, and enable ourselvs to take our rightful places as citizens of this great republic. Even at the present time none of us are entirely free from orthodoxy. It meets us at every step. We are still bound down by cruel and unjust church laws, and now they are even trying to overturn our public school system and establish parochial schools in their stead, thereby perverting a positiv good into a pregnant evil, a step which Americans must never allow.

State Freethought organizations will be able to supply an antidote to the poisonous influence of priestcraft, and with honorable combinations resist the encroachments of sacerdotalism upon the traditional liberties of our institutions.

The evils of superstition upon the minds of our young are certainly deplorable, and these institutions are a necessity for their removal, and to hasten that happy time when education shall hav emancipated the masses from the many political and social evils that now weigh them down to the dust.

In various articles and letters I hav frequently urged our friends to unite and organize. I now reiterate that advice. They hav talked of organization, and then let the matter rest, but now, realizing that those propositions and suggestions are a dead letter, unless put into practice, it has been decided to take immediate steps toward putting them into effect. Each and every state should hav an organization of its own; and these could easily be established if our friends throughout the country would only exert themselvs in this direction. Such organizations are certainly desirable, and practicable if our friends would only giv their minds to it, but I regret to say that at present their ardor seems to evaporate in an occasional meeting or a country picnic. Every Freethinker desires to see something accomplished, they desire to see results; and the work can never be realized while we remain in an isolated condition; but with an effectiv organization in each state, assisted and encouraged by the continuous efforts of able and devoted lecturers, we could raise such an excitement and such an interest that would claim the attention of the Christian world, thereby enforcing public recognition and consequent opposition, which would be of the utmost service to our cause; for after all, opposition is our opportunity. The priests know this but too well, hence their timidity in encouraging debate. If we mean to keep our ground we must compel them to teach instead of preach, and this can only be done by one method, and that I urge upon all Freethinkers. Unite.

My first lecture in Columbus was attended with such a grand success that I look forward with pleasure to the meeting in April next. I was pleased to meet such stalwart Freethinkers as F. S. Montgomery, J. B. Cochran, Chas. Augustus, J. Simpson, Mrs. Lyndell, Dr. Schueller, Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Goodman. There are many Freethinkers in this city, but as elsewhere they lack the power of organization.

On again, the next day, to Shreve, where I was down for two more lectures, but here I found that bigoted ignorance, ever consistent with its own intolerant spirit, had rekindled the fires of persecution, and had employed the meanest trickery, worthy only of the most despicable tools of party politics, to deprive the Freethinkers of a place to meet in; consequently the lectures were given in an old shed used by the fire department to store the fire-ladder and other implements in. They had certainly done their utmost to discourage the friends in this little town, but they hav now learned that Freethinkers are too inflexible to bend to tyranny, and too tenacious to break and disperse, and I must certainly commend them for the zeal they manifested toward obtaining a place to meet in. My audiences were not so large as those which greeted me upon a previous occasion, owing in a great measure to the inconvenience experienced with regard to a hall and the extreme cold which kept the mercury hovering between zero and 12° below.

I was pleased to meet once more with my old friends in Shreve. While here I was entertained by V. D. Manson, Jr., and W. J. Smith, who vied with each other in trying to make my stay as pleasant as possible.

The state of affairs now existing in Shreve need not be tolerated any longer would they only take the initiatory steps toward improving their conditions. Splendid prospects are before them. Will they only put their shoulder to the wheel?

V. D. Manson, Sr., has made them an offer of a tract of land, another friend has offered them $500 toward building a hall of their own, one or two others hav offered $100 each, and several others smaller sums varying from $25 to $10 each. It is devoutly to be hoped that our Shreve friends will take immediate steps and put these splendid opportunities to the best possible advantage. Here, above any other place, the absolute necessity for organization is most exemplified. With a good society in the state of Ohio to assist and encourage our friends here, what valuable work could be done; and there are many more such places in the same state.

Friends, let me urge upon you once more to unite.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE third state meeting of the Liberal Association of Texas will be held in Waco April 8th to 10th.

FEBRUARY 19th Mrs. Sarah F. Norton addresses the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, upon the subject, "Motherhood, or Woman a National Care." The following Friday evening, February 26th, John R. Charlesworth will explain "The Philosophy of Secularism."

ANYONE in Iowa, Nebraska, or Kansas desiring to secure the services of Mrs. Mattie Krekel can address her for one month at Rockford, Ill. She is now in Texas doing valiant service. She has just closed a course of lectures in Austin to crowded houses. February 19th to 23d she speaks at Carthage, Mo., the old home of Watson Heston.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: If you were to ask almost anyone this question: "What is Christianity?" I presume he would think that he could answer right, the first time, without even looking in the dictionary. Well, he could not.

I have been trying hard to find out what it is for some years past. I have wasted a good deal of valuable time at it; I have listened to doctrinal sermons, read religious papers carefully, and studied Sunday-school lesson leaflets, and am to-day sure of just one point, and that is: Christianity is one thing for grown men. It is quite another thing for women and children.

The cradle has fallen heir to the discarded dogmas of the pew. The pulpit no longer dares to teach openly what it retains in its creeds and confessions of faith. It preaches and lectures upon ethics to men. It attitudinizes and appeals to the emotions and prejudices of women; but it works off all its original theories upon the poor, inoffensive, helpless little children, and the Sunday-school lesson leaflets still give us the devil with a big D, and require the infant mind to believe in the actual resurrection of the dead and the manufacture of real live snakes out of sticks of wood properly voodooed by an ancient sleight-of-hand performer.

There are just two strong props under the church to-day—the sentiment of women and the ignorance of children.

When those are removed the stays here and there which men still slip in for financial or social reasons will be easily withdrawn, and intellectual liberty will be a fact and not merely a name.

But so long as the laws of heredity last no man can give free brains to his children if their mother is the victim of superstition and priestcraft. And so long as the pews are filled with women the cradle will be shadowed by fear and science will continue to fight superstition.

It seems to be pretty generally conceded by the press, and even, in many cases, by the pulpit, in these days, that a man may be a Freethinker, an Infidel, or an Agnostic without material injury to his constitution and without endangering his neighbor's woodpile.

Indeed, there are people who go the length of saying that a man may honestly doubt the correctness of other men's religious opinions without necessarily being a subject for a strait-jacket.

But while they make this magnanimous concession to men, they appear to be totally unable to apply it to women.

They can readily comprehend and forgive a Darwin or a Haeckel if he disturbs the old theories in behalf of a pollywog. But a George Eliot or a Cady Stanton or a Helen Gardener does a shameful thing if she questions the Mosaic or Christian decrees in behalf of womanhood.

The whole Christian system has been readjusted that it might not do violence to an astronomical observation or a geological discovery. The track of a bird in the sand, or the print of a leaf in a rock, when scientifically understood, was enough to undermine the faith of Christendom, and convert dogmatic theology into what it is to-day—an organized system of apologetics.

So it has come about that many of those who admit that the Bible is mistaken in its estimate of bugs and shrimps, still insist that it is the final word for at least one-half of the human race.

While it may be in error, and subject to revision in the interest of grasshoppers, no woman may reject its estimate of herself. No man may question its decrees in behalf of mother, sweetheart, or wife. Theologians are unable to see why a mother should cease to admire the beauties of infant damnation.

But the frightful fact still remains that there are women who object to that scheme. There are women who think that it has its weak points; there are women who, after going carefully through the Bible and studying all the passages to and for and about women, have got the impression somehow that there is something wrong. They don't blame the "daughters of Midian" for suspecting that Jehovah had his little faults.

If I were a professional prophet, or an almanac maker, I should write something like this: "Along about this time look out for editorials in religious papers, and also for sermons, which contain the following sentiment: 'It is bad enough for a man to be an Infidel, but for a woman it is simply appalling. We say that it is worse for a woman to doubt revealed religion, for the reason that to it she owes all that makes her life worth living. It is to the Bible woman owes' etc." Any of you can write out the rest some time with your eyes shut.

They will deplore the fact that she is beginning to lose her faith in the beautiful provisions of providence, which award her the blame for all the ills of life, while it forbids her to receive most of its benefits.

But there are two or three fairly plain reasons for the growing skepticism of intelligent women, which seem to me sufficient to satisfy her most exacting censors.

Here is one reason, and it is absolutely new. I throw it out for the benefit of the "old straw" critics. Let the clergy meet it fairly before asking women to admire Jehovah with any degree of enthusiasm. You know it is the fashion to cry out that anyone who takes up this subject is only "threshing old straw." As if it were possible to do anything else on either side so long as the book, the theories, and the type of thought under discussion date back a few thousand years. But here is the absolutely new sheaf of straw which I offer the clergy.

A short time ago it was proposed to prepare a Bible for women—or a woman's Bible. It was suggested that all passages which refer to, or deal with women in any way whatsoever, should be printed in the order in which they come in the Bible. Thus giving women an opportunity to read, in a few pages, her whole Bible, all of it which applies directly to her.

It was proposed to begin with Genesis and to end with Revelation.

To omit no word to or about women.

To change nothing, to add nothing.

Well, do you know why it was not done at that time? I will tell you.

The compilers, of whom I was one, had gone only a very little way when they discovered that the book when finished would be very, very small; but that it would be excluded if printed in English, and rightly excluded from the United States mails on the ground of obscenity.

That is the divine book for women.

Almost without exception the direct messages from Jehovah to or for or about women are of such nature that they are to-day considered, and I reiterate rightly considered, since we have a law against obscenity sent by mail, as too indecent to transmit through the post-office.

As a human being he did not deal with her at all. As an animal he dealt with her from the most brutal and degraded side, upon the lowest possible grounds from the outlook of a barbarian.

This is the God she is asked to worship! I have said somewhere before, and I now repeat, that as a mythological or semi-historical work the Bible is no worse than several others. As a divine revelation it is simply monstrous.

Do you wonder that women who are capable of even a limited degree of thought are beginning to ask uncomfortable questions and to have decided mental reservations?

There is, however, not one Christian woman in a thousand who knows what the Bible teaches for her. They don't read it. There are certain chapters or verses they go over frequently which are substituted for the whole book.

They don't know that it teaches polygamy. Well, it does. It is taught both directly and indirectly, and the only consistent followers Jehovah has to-day live out in Utah.

They don't know that it teaches slavery for women and the actual sale of daughters by fathers not only for work but for the vilest purposes. Well, it does.

One of the most explicit talks God had with man was one in which he directed a father how to sell his daughter, and for what purposes.

And to prevent her from misunderstanding her status, her degradation, and her own subject position, God went farther, in that cheerful little chat, and let her know what she was not to do after she was sold. Never dawned on Jehovah that it might be just as well for her father not to sell her at all. He never thought of that!

The clergy overlook these little points.

They only take the half they like. They are like the little girl whose father told her he was very sorry she had to be scolded so much. He said, "You don't know how bad it makes me feel to hear your mamma have to scold you so often." She said, "Now papa, don't you worry about that. I don't. I hardly ever hear more than half she says."

Christian women don't know that every man or woman who keeps a brothel for the degradation of sweet young girls has more texts to sustain him in his infamous traffic than any court of justice can find to quote against him. Well, he has.

The fact is, Christians don't know what the Bible teaches. They don't hear more than half it says—the half they like.

It is Infidels who study the Bible—all of it. And that is the very reason that they are Infidels. The Catholic church is the only one that has good judgment. It doesn't allow its people to read the Bible. Well, that is their only safety.

The result is that this church far outnumbers all other Christian sects and it is the only one not thoroughly honeycombed with unbelief to-day. Her people don't read the Bible. The result is they believe every word of it. Not one Protestant in a hundred believes it all. Hell is not fashionable in any Protestant country to-day. Ask any Protestant you know if he believes in it. He won't give a direct answer. He will dodge and skip all around it. He will explain it away, as the revisers tried to do. Or else he will deny a belief in it altogether.

Now, it is different in Catholic Russia. She is to-day the most orthodox country on the globe. She believes so honestly in hell that she has undertaken to illustrate it right at home. And it is pretty generally believed by those who have been to Siberia that the copy excels the original several laps. Russia believes that Jehovah is God, that God is perfect in his methods and decrees, and she obeys the injunction, "Strive to be like Him."

In numerous ways different people have striven to be like Him in this country. Their failure to achieve greater distinction in a very large majority of cases has been due to the brevity of their subsequent careers.

Brigham Young read of the Lord's anointed. He searched diligently the scriptures. He learned that in all the ages past no man had been so wise as Solomon. That the almighty exalted and commended him for his wisdom and his works. That he pronounced Solomon most like himself of all the sons of men. Thereupon Mr. Young established in Utah, as nearly as he could, a court, a church and a household upon a pattern and plan thus approved by Jehovah. The result you all know.

In a Christian land—in a land where the children are still taught to believe in the superior wisdom of Solomon, and his approval by and personal intimacy with deity—this, his most consistent follower and admirer, was outlawed and disgraced.

The precepts of Jehovah are taught every week from the pulpit and carefully legislated against every winter in Congress.

Men vote money to sustain churches and chaplains to proclaim the superior wisdom of the past—and then they go into executive session, so to speak, and vote more money to equip legislatures and armies to prevent just such "wisdom" from becoming too prevalent near home.

God the almighty gives us a man as a perfect type of wisdom. Senator Edmunds, the Presbyterian, begs to offer an amendment. With God is the vote of most of the Mormon church. With Edmunds that of the rest of the civilized world.

Can the morals and verdict of a perfect God be thus subject to revision by a senator of the United States? Shall Sunday-school children be allowed to know that Jehovah's measures of wisdom and goodness are too small to fit Vermont?

But until some monstrous moral or social evil threatens the very life of our constitutional government our near-sighted legislators travel the old orthodox path and lay a smooth and level road to be traveled by the worst enemies of progress and freedom. Then remorse, or ambition, clears their vision and a little dam is built across a tremendous stream which their own beliefs and conduct help to swell. But these spurts of clear-headed Infidel judgment remind me of the little fellow's idea of remorse. The teacher said: "Now, children, I'm going to put the words you've learned to spell and define here on the blackboard. I want you to write a sentence for each, showing that you fully understand the definition by using the words correctly. Take first the word 'remorse.'" They all wrote. "Now, Johnnie," said she, "you are a clear-headed little fellow. Read what you wrote." Johnnie arose in all the pride of praise well earned and read this: "A thief once wrote to his victim, 'Ten years ago I stole $50 from you. Remorse is now a-nawin' at my vitals. Inclosed please find $5. When she naws again I'll send some more.'"

So a little while ago Congress thought it saw a danger approaching from the devout followers of the very Jehovah which it employs a chaplain to pray to and it exhibited about five dollars' worth of unorthodox remorse by striking at polygamy.

I've been looking for it to "gnaw again" because of Catholic encroachments upon and antagonisms to our free public schools, but as yet their vitals appear to be intact, and certainly the threatening assurance of that hydra-headed poisoner of childhood's pure mental streams—that enemy of all mental freedom or intellectual development—the Roman Catholic church, has its vitals still unstung, and its grasp firmly upon the brain of those who are to legislate for us later on. And so they are steadily giving over our free institutions into the clutch of the one organization for which freedom of thought has but one meaning and that is death.

We can go no longer to Bible or pulpit for our answers to catechism questions. Indeed the catechism is not now the simple study it once was, and I am heartily glad that I stopped teaching it before it reached its present complicated state. It is growing to be something like this:

"Who was the first man, mamma?" "Ask Darwin."

"Where is heaven?" "Ask Herschel."

"How many days did it take to make the earth?" "Ask Lyell."

"What is the chief duty of man?" "Ask Haeckel and Spencer."

"Well, mamma, at least you know who the wisest man is, don't you?" "Great heavens, child, ask Senator Edmunds or John Wanamaker, they at least are orthodox."

"Strive to be like Him!" is said in earnest, humble faith by the devotees of Utah. "Strive to be moral!" is shouted from the United States Senate and emphasized by the flash of bayonet and the boom of cannon. "Strive to be like Him!" is echoed from every pulpit in America. "Do it at your peril!" is the response of the law. Which do we believe in to-day—Jehovah or morality? Bible legend or rational experience? Pulpit platitudes or progress?

"Strive to be like Him!" was graven deep in the heart of the South, and every lash that descended upon the bared back of a slave mother reminded her that absolute obedience, unquestioning faith, submission, and humiliation were the lessons taught by Jehovah and the conditions required by the church.

And according to a report in the New York World not long ago, the lesson taught by the repeal of the fugitive slave laws has not yet reached the priests of the Paulist church in that city. And perhaps it is as well to say just here that the so-called Paulist fathers are all converts from Protestant denominations, and that it is one of the very largest and strongest of the Roman Catholic orders. It was one of the Paulist fathers who, in preaching against the theories of Henry George, insisted that because a thing—a law—is old it must be right, and that we have no right to change to a better way—not even a right to listen to those who think they have discovered new light. He said:

> From time immemorial there have been false prophets, men who preached doctrines that they claimed were for the good of mankind, but which upon investigation were contrary to the law of God. Some of these false prophets were philosophers and politicians, and donning the garb of the shepherd would go among the shepherds and preach their views. They laid down laws for the people to follow, telling them that this was right and that wrong; telling them to look out for this world and let the next take care of itself. What did they care if such doctrines were opposed to the law laid down by the Almighty for the government of society? It was not for them to inquire. Their only desire was to spread broadcast their views and reap the benefit of them.
> There are false prophets at the present day. Some are philosophers and others politicians. The politicians are now preaching a plan by which the social laws are to be changed and society to be improved. Those preachers are going contrary to the law laid down by God and the church. They say that property shall be divided, and the whole system by which society has progressed shall be altered and made to conform to their views. Such views are outrageous and should not be encouraged by Catholics. Any man or men that preach such doctrines are false to God and to his law. What right has any man to change old-established social laws, laws that Catholics are bound to obey on account of the faith? The laws that have for centuries governed society are laws that have been laid down by God, and you, as Catholics, are bound to obey them.

Every hot iron that branded on the breast of the captive the future reminder of his lesson began that lesson with the same sentiment and ended with the same threat. "Servants obey your masters." "Be in subjection to the powers that be." "And my chosen people are set above thee."

"I will make thee an outcast among thy people." And "Strive to be like Him" blazed in heavenly glory over the head of the brute whose orthodox lash drew on the back of doubt or rebellion the blood of anguish and repentance.

"Strive to be like Him" echoed through the wilderness where forty years of despair and anguish was the portion meted out by a "loving father" to those who had, like the poor slave, believed in their own right to be free.

And "Strive to be like Him" comes amid the groans of the dying and the shrieks of the tortured from the plains of Midian and thunders from the walls of Eden itself.

"Strive to be like Him" whispered in the ear of ignorance and faith as an old man in Pocasset, Mass., tremblingly bent over his sleeping babe as he plunged the fatal knife into her snowy breast!

And "Strive to be like Him" came from the pale lips of the mother as she saw him falter in his deadly work.

"Strive to be like Him" should be graven over the door of every house of ill repute, and the whole of the thirty-first chapter of Numbers chiseled upon its walls!

The civilized world has read with horror the late revelations of the Pall Mall Gazette and the Cleveland street horrors, and has demanded the exposure and punishment of the fiends who traffic in woman's honor and in children's blood.

"Strive to be like Him" should be the response of every man who holds in his hand the Bible, and in his heart a belief in the goodness and purity of Jehovah the defiler of the daughters of Midian—the London of old.

No man need bring to any consistent Christian court any defense but the record of the life of Moses, our "Prophet," and the commands of God to him. He can rest his case on Solomon and Lot. David will be his witness, and Jehovah will defend his case. Power is the only law of heaven, and submission the sole duty of women.

If all this is not true—and somehow or other I doubt it—but if it is not true, then "inspiration" is a pretense, and every orthodox preacher is a slanderer of the God he worships. If the attitude of Jehovah toward women is not wholly vicious, and the display of brutal power is not our only "revelation" of him, then some mistake has been made, and our Bibles, our pulpits, and our Sunday-school lessons in particular, need moralizing. The only men who are "godlike" are those who trample upon every right of others, upon every sense of justice, upon every moral principle, and give as their only reason—Power.

A belief in such a God is enough to demoralize the whole human race. And, with such an ideal, we can only wonder that reform schools are not more numerous and that prisons are ever empty.

On the Pacific Coast.

News and Notes.

The Paine celebration at San Francisco was one of the most brilliant ever held in the city. The hall was filled to overflowing. A thousand people were present. The portrait of Thomas Paine—painted by Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, and which has adorned every celebration in the city for the last sixteen years—was in full view of the audience. Around it and the platform was wreathed the star-spangled banner. Flowers decorated the table. The meeting was called to order at 8 o'clock by C. F. Burgman, president of the San Francisco Freethought Society. Letters of congratulation were read from L. K. Washburn, James Barrie and others. Attention was called to other celebrations going on throughout the country—at Boston, New York, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Los Angeles, Stockton, etc. Under the leadership of Mr. Baxter the vast audience arose and joined in singing "The Star-Spangled Banner." Miss Palanca then recited in an admirable manner Ingersoll's "Apostrophe to Liberty." The veteran soldier, Thomas Curtis, with the fire of youth still in his veins, gave an original poem, written especially for the occasion, "The Immortal Man." An address was made by Judge J. H. Leining, of Colusa, followed by some happy remarks from Professor Bell, who has just returned from his long lecture trip. Mrs. Julia Schlesinger, of the Carrier Dove, delivered a beautiful eulogy on Thomas Paine, after which Albert Curlin, editor of the Volk's Zeitung, of the Pacific coast, aroused the enthusiasm of all by a stirring speech in the German language. The force of his oratory was felt by those who could not understand the burning words. Then the members of German singing societies—seventy-five in number—thrilled the audience with their magnificent choruses. The exercises were closed with addresses by Mrs. Addie L. Ballou and Samuel P. Putnam. After 10 o'clock music came into play, and under the genial conduct of Mr. J. O. Burdick young and old joined in the festival march, and until 12 o'clock there was gaiety and splendor, while the serene countenance of Thomas Paine looked down upon the happy throng—seeing something of the glory yet to be when his mighty pen shall hav triumphed over superstition.

On Saturday morning the convention of the California State Liberal Union opened in dead earnest. Those who came there came to do business. It was a working convention. S. P. Putnam opened the proceedings with an address on "The Religious Conspiracy," which showed the gravity of the situation of the Farmers' Alliance. Mr. Tatum, one of its representativs, declared that it was not in favor of closing the World's Fair on Sunday—that it was in favor of liberty. Remarks were made by Mr. Burgman, Mr. A. Lee, and others. It is hoped that the Farmers' Alliance will set itself right on this important matter.

The report of the secretary, Mr. Lemme, was then read. It showed the valuable work which had been done during the past year, especially in checkmating the designs of the Sabbath Union in its endeavor to pass a Sabbath law. There was a debate in the senate chamber at Sacramento which lasted until midnight. The ministers rallied in force, and the adherents of church legislation, but were most thoroughly routed. By unanimous vote of the legislativ committee the proposed law was laid upon the table. So far the Liberals are ahead, but the fight will be renewed.

Charles F. Burgman, Judge J. H. Leining, and Thomas Curtis were appointed a committee on resolutions, and W. H. Eastman, Miss C. L. Frost, and A. R. Woodhams committee on nominations.

The convention then adjourned until evening.

The evening session was well attended. Mr. Putnam opened the meeting with reading the Demands of Liberalism, and calling for signatures. A large number were added to the list of membership. Addresses on the scope and mission of Liberalism were made by Charles F. Burgman, J. H. Leining, Thomas Curtis, A. Lee, Morris Lee, and others. Mr. A. R. Woodhams, of Santa Clara, gave his experience with the Farmers' Alliance. Because he could not assent to the dogma of a "supreme being," he was shut out, although a farmer, and thoroughly interested in economical reforms. Will the Farmers' Alliance open its doors to all, or will it run on the narrow lines of an ecclesiastical party?

This Saturday evening meeting was a full, frank, genial, and fearless discussion of the main points of Liberal work and method.

The third session was held on Sunday afternoon. The committee on nominations reported. S. P. Putnam was elected president; Emil Lemme, secretary; W. H. Eastman, treasurer; Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, corresponding secretary; also the executiv committee and a large number of vice-presidents were elected whose names will be given hereafter in the regular report of the secretary. The committee on resolutions reported. The resolutions adopted will also be published in the secretary's report. Short addresses were made by Wm. Burgess, Morris Lee, D. Christie, and others. At 3 o'clock the convention was joined by N. F. Ravlin and his whole society, and before the large audience thus gathered Mr. Ravlin delivered one of his characteristic speeches, and delighted his hearers with wit and eloquence. Mr. Ravlin was once a Baptist preacher, but he is now a Liberal and a Spiritualist, unbounded by any creed, and a fearless antagonist of any union of church and state. After Mr. Ravlin's address, which was enthusiastically received, Mrs. Dr. Treadwell recited in a charming manner, "The Old Continental Bell," which blended the memories of the Revolution with the hopes of to-day. It was a fitting close to this inspiring session, which was one of the best of the convention. In the evening it rained, but the hall presented an animated appearance and the storm did not dampen the enthusiasm. Miss Russell and Miss Marion Chase delighted the audience with songs, and Miss Schultz made the piano giv forth its charming melody. A message of greeting was read by the president from Luna Hutchison, also the following from J. Henry Shroeder, president of the Oregon State Secular Union: "To the California State Liberal Union in convention assembled. Greeting: I greet you fraternally, hoping that your deliberations may be cordial and harmonious, and that your every effort to separate church and state may be successful."

A message by telegraph from Robert C. Adams, president of the Canadian Secular Union, was welcomed with rousing cheers—"Canada's Freethinkers greet California's convention. May you hasten the day when the rights of man and the 'Age of Reason' shall control the continent from the St. Lawrence to the Golden Gate."

These messages set the key-note for our closing session. Mrs. Ballou made one of her telling addresses on "Freethought and Reform," which was received with frequent applause by the interested auditors. It was wise, witty, and patriotic, and could not hav been a better peroration to what was said and done in this convention, the best ever held in the state of California. The attendance was large. Friends from the country were present. There was interest and enthusiasm from beginning to end. This convention shows what can be done if we only take hold, and do our level best; keep our flag flying no matter what happens. We are confident of our power to advance to success.

Chas. F. Burgman, Albert Curlin, Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, Mrs. Julia Schlesinger, and R. Butterfield were appointed legislativ and general committee to carry on the work outlined by the convention during the coming year.

California will maintain its position in the front line.

It is said the women help the churches well. The women helped us this time, and without their aid these grand meetings would not hav been so successful in numbers and pecuniary results. We are especially indebted to Mrs. Emil Lemme, Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, Mrs. Julia Schlesinger, and Miss C. L. Frost, for their untiring efforts in our cause.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 1, 1892.

The ball rolls on. After the splendid meeting at San Francisco it is a pleasure to greet again a full house at Stockton. The work has moved on here in lively proportions. The Paine celebration was a great affair. It so stirred up the churches that a special prayer-meeting was appointed against its good fortune, but the prayers did not avail; they did not go high enough. The Infidel colors were flying, the house was crowded, and no accident occurred. Six churches hav combined for a revival, but somehow the converts do not materialize. Every seat was occupied last night at the lecture on "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Infidelity." The Freethought element of Stockton is of a varied and comprehensiv sort, and takes interest in the discussion of every theme. There is always a welcome for every opinion, philosophy, and fact.

After the lecture there gathered an informal circle at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Ruhl, where there was a happy surprise of good things and good company, which givs one courage for the labors of the field. I was pleased to meet my old comrade, Mr. Ryan, formerly of Evansville, Ind., where Chainey and myself were engaged in intellectual struggle, and Ryan was ready to stand by us. Chainey has flitted I know not where, but friend Ryan and myself still cling to the solid earth. But as Ryan says, the mighty power of evolution goes on, and he thinks I hav advanced since I was in the Unitarian pulpit. I hope that is so, for though a Materialist I believe in knowing more from day to day.

Thomas Paine Celebration.

The 155th anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday was held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, on Friday evening, January 29th, commencing at 8 P.M. Over six hundred people were present; every seat was taken; quite a number of persons returned home, as they could find no seats nor standing-room.

President C. F. Burgmann of the San Francisco Freethought Society made the opening address, which was followed by chorus song of the "Star-Spangled Banner" by the audience. A very good program of speeches, music, recitals, etc., was carried out (see program).

The following contains the full account of the receipts and expenses for the Thomas Paine celebration:

San Francisco, Feb. 3, 1892.

Fourth Annual Convention of the California State Liberal Union at San Francisco, Cal.

Fourth annual convention of the California State Liberal Union met at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, at 10 o'clock A.M.

About sixty delegates were present. Pres. S. P. Putnam called the meeting to order, and gave an address on "Religious Conspiracy." Professor Tatum, of the Farmers' Alliance, followed, arguing that the Farmers' Alliance repudiated the statement of the Associated Press that the Alliance had advocated the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays.

Mr. Thomas Curtis followed, saying that he never heard of any resolutions passed by the Farmers' Alliance that it was against the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday.

Mr. C. F. Burgmann wanted to see an official document to that effect. Mr. Lee followed with a short speech.

The secretary then read his report of the proceedings of the Union during the year, which was adopted as read.

Motion that the president appoint a committee on resolutions—carried.

The following members were elected on this committee: C. F. Burgmann, San Francisco; Judge Leining, Colusa; Thomas Curtis, San Francisco.

Motion that the president appoint a committee on nominations—carried.

The following members were elected: W. H. Eastmann and Miss C. L. Frost, San Francisco; A. R. Woodham, Santa Clara.

The meeting then adjourned till 8 o'clock P.M.

January 30th.—The convention met at Union Square Hall at 8 o'clock P.M.

President S. P. Putnam called the meeting to order.

The following members gave short addresses: A. R. Woodham, Santa Clara; C. F. Burgmann, president Freethought Society; Thomas Curtis, of San Francisco; Judge Leining, Colusa; A. Lee, San Francisco; Morris Lee, San Jose.

A collection taken up amounted to $11.15.

Adjournment to 2 P.M., Jan. 31, 1892.

January 31st.—The convention met at Union Square Hall at 2 o'clock P.M.

President S. P. Putnam called the meeting to order.

The committee on nominations made the following report: For president, S. P. Putnam; secretary, Emil S. Lemme; corresponding secretary, Addie Ballou; treasurer, W. H. Eastman—all of San Francisco.

Ross, Riverside; Mrs. Scott-Briggs-Voy, San Francisco; H. A. Newman, Santa Ana.

All were elected.

Moved that Alfred Grigsby, C. Lee, J. C. Ward, Visalia; Judge J. H. Leining, Colusa; George E. Macdonald, Snohomish, Wash.; and Mrs. George Lawton, San Francisco, be added to the list of vice-presidents. Carried.

The committee on resolutions reported as follows:

Resolved, That this convention records with regret the loss by death to the cause of Secularism of Wm. Paddon, aged eighty-four years, an honorable citizen of San Francisco. Mr. Paddon was for fifty years an Atheist. He died in perfect peace. Also the death of Gus. Weiskopf, aged twenty-eight years. Mr. Weiskopf was of Jewish family. In San Francisco he was highly esteemed as a merchant and deeply regretted by a large circle of friends. He was for many years an Atheist, and he died peacefully. At the request of his family Thomas Curtis delivered his funeral address. Also the death of Frederic Schueneman Pott, for over thirty-five years the speaker of the Frei Gemeinde Congregation in Philadelphia and San Francisco. Also the death of Mrs. Leland, the widow of T. C. Leland, for many years indentified with the cause of Freethought. Also P. A. Clark and J. L. Grigsby, members of our society.

Resolved, That "The Ladies' Relief Protective Society" of San Francisco, in refusing to giv Mrs. E. L. Watson the privilege of adopting a little child on the ground that she would not promis to send it "regularly to an established Christian Protestant church and Sunday-school," has violated the rights of the Liberal and non-Christian tax-payers of the state of California, inasmuch as this is a public institution, sustained from the public treasury, and therefore it should be thoroughly nonsectarian in its administration, and no religious test of any kind should be applied in the care or the adoption of the orphans in its charge; and this convention declares that no more money should be taken from the state funds to support this institution until it is conducted on a purely secular basis, regarding the rights of all the people, without reference to any church or religion.

Resolved, That the World's Fair, which is supported by all the people, and is for the benefit of all the people, should be open on Sunday, the only day in the week when millions can enjoy its great and inspiring pictures of human progress. This universal exhibition of art and industry is in itself an education, ennobling and purifying. It is altogether for good and not for evil—teaching lessons of human virtue and hope; and to close its gates on Sunday out of deference to the customs of any sectarian religion would be an outrage upon the rights of the people, would destroy much of its beneficial influences, and be a blow not only to liberty and justice, but to civilization, to advancement, and to true morality. Any church or any religion that would close these gates on Sunday is a curse and not a blessing to mankind, and shows itself to be founded upon ignorance, bigotry, and superstition.

Amendment added to this:

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be printed and sent to all the vice-presidents of the California State Liberal Union to obtain signatures for them to be used as petitions.

Resolved, That this convention condemns the imprisonment of Moses Harman and Ezra Heywood for excercising their legitimate and constitutional right of free speech and free press.

Resolved, That we condemn in the strongest terms the prosecution and imprisonment of men for exercising their legitimate and constitutional, as well as natural, right to employ their time in providing for themselvs and family on Sundays, as in the case of Mr. King, of Tennessee.

Resolved, That we extend our sympathy and activ aid to all organizations having for their object the improvement of the toiling wage-workers employed in commerce, industry, and agriculture.

Resolved, That we giv aid and encouragement to the farmers in their struggle against the various monopolies which oppress and plunder them. But caution them against the evil influences of religious creeds in their organizations.

Resolved, That we call upon all Liberals and Freethinkers to exercise their power as citizens during elections, unqualifiedly, against any political party using public institutions, such as the post-office, to aid religious fanaticism.

Resolved, That in view of the enforced reading of the Bible in the public schools of Sacramento and other places, and also the maintenance of other religious services in the schools of this city and elsewhere, steps be taken whereby the question of constitutionality of any religious services in our public schools shall be brought to the courts for decision according to the constitution.

Resolved, That the legislativ committee, appointed by this convention, be instructed to introduce into the next legislature a bill for the abolition of the chaplaincy.

All these resolutions were unanimously adopted as read, with the exception of the third resolution, to which was added an amendment, and then adopted with same.

Several other resolutions about the training of children in our public schools, reform of the divorce laws, abolishment of marriage license, and discontinuance of religious songs in our city public schools were introduced. With the exception of this last resolution, the first three were moved to be laid on the table; the last resolution is covered by one of the former and adopted resolutions. After this short speeches were delivered by Messrs.

Burgess, Christie, Tho. Curtis, Miss C. Frost and Addie Ballou, and Mr. Morris Lee.

About this time Dr. N. F. Ravlin came in with his congregation of about two hundred and fifty, who had voted to attend our convention.

Dr. Ravlin made a strong and interesting address, stating the necessities of combined actions of all Liberals, without regard to belief, against our common enemy.

Mrs. Dr. Treadwell then closed the meeting with a eulogy on Thomas Paine. A collection gave $8.50. About three hundred and fifty people were present.

Adjournment till 8 P.M.

Meeting of convention at same place at 8 o'clock P.M.

President Putnam called the meeting to order.

The following members were elected on the legislativ committee: C. F. Burgmann, Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, San Francisco; Mrs. Julia Schlesinger, San Francisco; R. Butterfield, Sacramento; and Albert Curlin, San Francisco. Communications were received and read by the president from Robt. C. Adams, Montreal, Can.; Luna Hutchinson, Letcher, Cal.; and Henry Schroeder, president of the Oregon State Secular Union. Miss Jennie Russell and Miss Clease rendered songs for the occasion. Mrs. Addie Ballou followed with an address.

Prof. W. S. Bell, who was to speak this evening, did not come.

Treasurer W. H. Eastman read his report, which was adopted as read:

EMIL S. LEMME,
Secretary California State Liberal Union.

Mr. Henry Frank and the Sun.

From the Sun of February 6th.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN, Sir: Your very able editorial upon the new Society for Radical Religious and Social Reform somewhat misconceives the purpose of the society in assuming that it is founded wholly upon negations. Personally my own position is distinctivly affirmativ and positiv. I recognize the futility of mere negation. But the intellectual force which will initially hold together a great concourse of people possessing divergent views must necessarily be primarily negativ and antagonistic.

All religions were founded in revolt against antecedent established religions. In other words, all historical religions were primarily founded in antagonism, in denial—that is, in infidelity against accepted authority. It would seem that enthusiasm must be the offspring of contention and warfare; that the mind cannot grow heated and diffused with new illumination until it has first risen to throw off ancient conceptions and superstitions which hav long beclouded it. We cannot battle for a great idea until we hav first battled against a great overmastering wrong. Jesus was first anti-Pharisaic before He became the irene and illuminated avatar. Buddha must first flee the courts of Brahmanistic tyranny and delusion before he receives his sublime revelations under the benign Bo tree. Luther must first slay the "Harlot of Rome" before he can embrace the new love which shall charm and enlist the world. Thus the infidelity of free thought has for ages been but a revolt against established superstition and corruption. The battle-cry which shall call together all lovers of freedom under one flag must therefore be negativ and contentious. But when the forces are assembled, the constructiv and conservativ phases of work may be developed.

I thank you that, in commenting upon the broad and general principles which I enunciated as our proposed basis, you remark: "We are not surprised that Colonel Ingersoll is among the supporters of the movement. Dr. Briggs and Dr. Lyman Abbott might also join without doing violence to their principles carried out logically." That is exactly the purpose of the new society, namely to make the common grounds of union so comprehensiv that all schools of untrammeled thinkers who are revolting against established wrongs and corrupted theologies, will be able consistently to join us without surrendering or doing violence to their personal convictions. But you also say: "Religion must hav faith, dogma, authority beyond the human." We hav a positiv side to our intellectual positions. We affirm faith in man, faith in the laws of nature, faith in the persistent, pervasiv ethical energy of the universe, faith in the ultimate happiness of humanity and harmony of all things. We hav faith, too, in the superhuman purposiv potency of nature. We look upon the universe as the involution of the divine potentialities. The All-Potential is within all and outworking through all. What this ultimate divine potentiality is we do not claim to be able fully to comprehend; but its scientific manifestations we can study and utilize. Therefore the purpose of our philosophy is to teach men to discover the laws of being that they may bring their lives in trend with the same. Herein we find our worship in the sublimest ideals, the loftiest hopes, the noblest purposes of the soul, by aspiration toward which our natures are uplifted. I do not mean by the worship of ideals, vague phantasies, and individual vagaries. I mean the loftiest ideals which are expressed in the processes of the universe, which are the outgrowth of the race experience, and ever ascend in the higher unfoldments of existence. Nature involves the supreme ideal ever revealed in individual expressions of itself. Man is the highest evolution of nature because the expression of its loftiest ideal; but that is not saying that necessarily man is the final and highest possible expression. Here we touch the region of the unknown.

Hence we may justly say we, too, hav our God—not anthropomorphic or supernatural, not unscientific, nevertheless God, which we may call the Supreme Ideal, involving all others, out of which all others are forthcoming; nothing less than the divine Good, which we perceive is the purpose of the universe prophesying the ultimate harmonizing of all things. This universal or All-Good (by which I mean the manifest inherent tendency of the universe to ultimate perfection and harmony) is the potency which mellows human existence and balances worlds in symmetrical relations. To recognize and extract from the universe this Supreme Good is the highest worship, and the possession of the most assuring because the most scientific God. It is around the great discoveries of science and the inspiring ethics of the newer life that we hope to congregate and enthuse.

But we shall depend for our association and fellowship chiefly on the social instinct of the race. I must still insist that ecclesiastical organizations are sustained because of this principle as well as by the authority of dogma or faith. At least, it is true that all that is left of the modern Protestant church is what is held together by the social instinct. What common faith is there among the Unitarians, among Congregationalists, or even among Presbyterians, which can be said to be free from diversity and dispute? Notwithstanding this notorious fact, especially emphasized in recent events, these great bodies cling together in their respectiv organizations.

Let me say in closing that the initial meeting of the new society proved overwhelmingly successful, in point of attendance, and many hundreds were turned away from Hardman Hall unable to secure entrance.

HENRY FRANK,
Lecturer to the Society of Human Progress.
New York, Jan. 30.

The Pantheistic Movement.

From the Sun of the same date.

A few weeks ago we referred to a movement started uptown for the organization of religious unbelievers of all kinds as a Society for Radical Religious and Social Reform. The author of the enterprise, Mr. Henry Frank, explains its theories and purposes in another column of this paper. He was formerly an orthodox Protestant minister, we believe, but now he rejects all faith in the supernatural and is trying to substitute for it scientific demonstration and optimistic confidence in "the ultimate happiness of humanity and harmony of all things."

His new religion, therefore, is nothing more than a revival of the old pantheism hitherto always unsatisfactory as food for the religious aspirations of the race. Strictly speaking, it is a philosophy rather than a religion. It is not faith in a divine being and worship of him, but admiration of a subjectiv and impersonal "supreme ideal," of the "all good," the supreme good" and "faith in man," "in the persistent, pervasiv ethical energy of the universe," "in the superhuman purposiv potency of nature."

These terms do not mean much. They are vague and general; but so is the thing itself without form and void. Neither is there any science about it, for it ventures into a domain into which science can never enter, a domain accessible only to faith, or as to which men must content themselvs with speculations altogether infantil as compared with its inexplorable vastness. Hence whoever is looking for science to explain the problem of existence, looks in vain. It can go further than man's capacity for knowledge, and that is limited within a range infinitesimally small. Outside of these bounds he must see, if he can see at all, with the eye of faith; or he must picture the unknowable regions beyond with his feeble imagination. All the science of all the ages has barely scraped the surface of knowledge, and it can never get much deeper relativly.

A religion, accordingly, which has no other foundation than science, is built on the sand. If mere ethical principles are its basis, it rests on the experience and conviction of men only. If it is built up from the imagination, it has no substantial corner-stone. If it is to hav absolute truth as its foundation, the truth must come as a supernatural revelation.

The only significance there is in the enterprise described so loosely by our correspondent is the indication it affords of the craving for some semblance of religion, some sort of fetich, even among those who reject all supernaturalism. They want to worship something, an abstract idea, if they can find nothing better. They want some support for their absolute feebleness as against the laws of nature. They hav exiled themselvs from the church, and in their homesickness they are hunting for a foster-mother.

The present theological controversy is rapidly increasing this multitude of the religiously homeless, and the enterprise of our correspondent seems to be an adroit device to gather them into a new fold. But it cannot be successful, for philosophy furnishes a bare and cold shelter as compared with religion, and it scatters rather than collects. The only sympathy between unbelievers comes from their being out in the cold together, and they can no more warm themselvs by worshiping a supreme ideal in common than they can get bodily sustenance from gnawing at a stone. The only thing for them to do is to travel along as best they can without religion, and dismiss the subject from their thoughts, as the Agnostics try to do. After a few meetings the enterprise of our correspondent will go into liquidation and he will disappear from such notice as he now courts.

Meantime Dr. Briggs, Dr. Van Dyke, Dr. Parkhurst, Dr. Lyman Abbott, and all that school of theologians will go on increasing the disorganized and unorganizable Agnostic and Pantheistic host by discrediting the inspiration of the scriptures with a theory of their origin which is substantially the same as his. The God who inspired the Bible, according to their teachings, so far as these are comprehensible at all, is the supreme ideal influencing the minds of the scriptural writers, but not removing from them their narrow human limitations and saving them from the consequences of their natural ignorance and perversion. This new school of theological critics discards utterly the old belief that the Bible is God's history and not man's; that he was the author and the human writers only his penmen. They take away the supernatural basis of theology and religion, leaving the church nothing more than a society for radical religious and social reform such as our correspondent is wasting his time in trying to establish. They, and not he, are the real leaders in the Pantheistic movement.

Benevolence Acknowledged.

AUBURN, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been obliged to drink of the cup of sorrow again so soon by the death of Mrs. Griffin, the wife of the late Charles Griffin. I am now left to fight the battle alone. I am truly thankful to those gentlemen, Mr. Butterfield and Mr. Owen Davis, of California, for their kindness. My gratitude to them I cannot express. The book when received will be highly appreciated by me, as the paper is highly prized and always is welcome. Also the $5 sent by Mr. Davis when received will be put to good use by one who is truly thankful. MARY J. JONES.

From Pious Pittsburgh.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am very well pleased with the way you are conducting the paper. So far as I am concerned I hav at least no instructions to giv. If you will send me twenty-five letters of protest against closing on Sunday at the Fair, and a few of those pamphlets (if you hav them) published at two cents by the Freethinkers' Magazine for missionary purposes, you may call the inclosed amount square for 1892. Last June I was badly used up on the railroad; got well of that, but in two weeks sprained my left ankle very badly, but it is getting all right. Christmas afternoon I buried my mother from my home, aged eighty years and one month. For all my misfortunes, I liv and hav the Christians' sympathy (now) in my neighborhood. Your "Letters from Friends" are very interesting, especially King Putnam. He is worth half a dozen himself. As I hav not been able to attend our Secular Society here on account of my ankle, I cannot inform you about its standing. That the Freethinkers are increasing here is beyond a doubt.

I am yours, etc., for full freedom and liberty for all as you teach it in your paper, J. J.

The Truth On the Virgin Mary.

Feb. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a great doubter all my life, but through all these weary years I hav held bravely on to a remnant of faith, and now, alas, that has gone and I find myself all aboard and helpless. I hav always believed that Webster's Unabridged was infallible in all matters pertaiding to the definition of words, but, oh, my! this last prop is knocked from under me. My little grandchild goes to Sunday-school, and the other Sunday her lesson dealt largely with the Virgin Mary and the birth of Jesus Christ. Childlike, she must be too inquisitiv, and had to ask foolish questions, and asked her teacher what a virgin was. Here was a poser, and with true Christian consistency the teacher concluded to use the truth with "prodigal frugality" and let its place be supplied with "an excessiv elongation of veracity." The answer was apparently satisfactory to the scholar, and she went home with her head filled with the newly acquired knowledge which she must needs air before her parents. Presently some one asked her, "What is a virgin?" Thanks to a good memory, she promptly gave her teacher's definition: "A virgin is a woman who has had a baby without being married."

EUREKA, UTAH, Jan. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription for 1892 I hav the pleasure to add to your list of contributors an acquaintance of mine, an intelligent reader. He is the only one that I could persuade this time to join hands, as I am surrounded in this small mining canyon by a large majority of Mormons and Catholics that still believe that the earth is square and supported under each corner by an angel, and that if anything moves the sun moves, as, if the earth was moving, as was said yesterday by a lately converted Mormon from Chattanooga, we could not stand erect. Quite a scientific plausibility! I thought he was joking, but no; he went on seriously telling me that he has had a revelation and that the Bible was right.

Of course illiteracy and ignorance reign supreme here among the laboring classes, imported as they are, whether by Mormons, missionaries, or Irish. The missionaries can only persuade the lowest class of men bipeds to come here.

Hoping I will soon receive my New Year's gift in the shape of the Picture Book in press, for which I hav sent a dollar already—and I wish I could hav sent $10—I remain, Very truly yours,

PAUL COIFFER.

"The Happy Infidel Family."

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Jan. 3, E.M. 292.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4; $3 for subscription to our valuable organ, and $1 for the Picture Book. I hav been trying to get a new subscriber, but, alas, at the last moment failed. But I will not giv up the ship. I send my TRUTH SEEKER broadcast over the town. The seed will take root some day and bring forth good fruit, "not chess." Would that I could shed the light of truth in this dark corner of the Lord's vineyard. The editor of our local paper, the Ballston Spa Daily News, said he would publish an article by me on Solomon's temple, but soon afterward informed me that the powers that be said that it must not be published. Upon investigation I was informed by a friend that the powers that be were a mighty man of orthodox valor of the Episcopal gender. Honest, he could not answer it. I then sent it to the Utica Globe, Utica, N. Y., with the same result. I was in hopes that some of our sky-pilots would reply so we could awaken an interest in the investigation of that Holy Rot called God's word in Ballston Spa. Hoping the TRUTH SEEKER family had a merry Christmas and happy New Year, we are, as ever,

Yours for humanity, science, and truth

Told Truths On God and His Favorits.

MASSILLON, O., Jan. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: It becomes a pleasant duty to report the lecture delivered by John R. Charlesworth at the Opera House on Jan. 17, 1892. His subjects were, "The Philosophy of Secularism," and "The Christian Religion a Bad Guide in Life." Both meetings were well attended, but he was greeted in the evening with one of the largest audiences that ever met a Freethought lecturer in Massillon. Too much praise cannot be given Mr. Charlesworth as an orator and a lecturer. The audience commanded his strictest attention throughout, being composed of Massillon's most respected and valued citizens. In speaking of the Christian religion he quoted several passages from the Old and New Testaments and showed that if such teachings were put into practice they would be destructiv of all social well-being. Christ condemned wealth and commended poverty. Wealth, he said, was held to be an insurmountable obstacle to the salvation of its possessor, and poverty was regarded as a through-ticket to everlasting glory. He also ridiculed the omnipotent wrestling all night with Jacob; and the folly, lust, and tyranny of Solomon, and the lies put into the mouths of the prophets by the Lord. Mr. Charlesworth endeared himself as a gentleman of superior capabilities, and we can cheerfully recommend him to all Liberals, hoping he will meet with the success he so well deserves.

Yours for truth, W. S. MOKE.

Death Ends All.—Also, A Fund Proposed.

MILLSVILLE, CAN., Dec. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Time for payments is near, and I here send you some to keep up the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and long may Heston liv and work until all evil is dead. Spiritualism is as great a fraud as Christianity, according to my thinking. I never had any evidence of a conscious existence after death of the body, and I do not think that I ever shall hav. When we die we die out and out, clear dead—no more of us then. If there is an existence beyond death I should like to know of it. I believe only Materialism is right and death ends all. We shall turn to the holy book at Eccles. iii, 19, 20: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast, for all is vanity. All go unto one place: all are of the dust and all turn to dust again." Psalm xlviii; Psalm cxlvi, 4: "Man's breath goeth forth: he returneth to his earth in that very day." His thoughts perish; his body and his thoughts all perish. What is left, please tell us? See Job xiv. See Mal. iv: "The wicked shall be ashes of stubble after being burnt up." No after life then—no heaven, no hell. Isa. xxvi, 14: "The dead shall not liv: they shall not rise: they are destroyed and shall perish."

There should be a small fund by the rich to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to a poor brother or sister or orphan that cannot pay for it and wants to read it.

JOHN SILLARS ARTHUR.

Pleased With God's Pictnre.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Jan. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I was much pleased with the picture of God in Vol. XIX, No. 1. The artist made no mistake on that, for it was drawn according to David; and what David did not know about God no other man has ever found out. As God and David were on intimate terms, and mutual admirers of each other, whatever God says about David, or David about God, must be accepted as pretty near the right thing. God tells us David was a man after his own heart, and knowing from the record some of David's characteristics, we can form an idea of God's; and when, with these characteristics, we hav a pen-picture of form, shape, and component parts, what more can one desire to know of God and his general make-up? As far as I am concerned, my faith and credulity are willing to rest on David's description, and no further effort to "find out God" will ever be made by the writer of this epistle. But I must admit in candor, that previous to the aid your inspired artist rendered David in making plain and clear the words of holy writ, I could never fully grasp, comprehend, and realize the exact make-up of God, to say nothing of the cherub; but now all is clear, open, and evident to soul and senses. Henceforth when bowed and bent in prayer at the family altar, a better conception of the invisible one to whom I am talking will fill the mind; and for this reason I publicly acknowledge the pleasure and profit derived from the lifelike and accurate picture which the genius and piety of artist Heston has led him to giv the world, and to fill one of the oldest long-felt wants known to the human race.

Gratefully yours, C. SEVERANCE.

The Old Orthodox Swamp Road.

TANEY, Jan. 7, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav handed a number of THE TRUTH SEEKERS to different friends of mine, some of whom are disbelievers of the holy scriptures, but refuse to subscribe for your paper as a number of their friends are Christians, and thereby they would lose a part of their popularity.

It seems that this world is lined with numerous roads through it, with no signboards, and as the old orthodox swamp road is the most traveled all take this road except those who hav brains enough to investigate, to reason and be governed according to their own intellectual convictions. Our postmaster, who believes it is a sin to investigate, had the impudence to open our paper and said the pictures were enough to scare a person.

About a year ago I was reminded of the good effect of Christianity upon man when I read in my county paper of a man at Palouse City who was a follower of the lamb, a soldier of the cross, and who had concluded this world was too wicked for himself and family to liv in, so he shot and killed his wife and all his children down like dogs and then shot himself. After a month of suffering the youngest child recovered.

Another one of God's inspired prophets was Charles Kirkendall, one of my acquaintances. He told me God had inspired him to perform miracles, and the first was to knock his brother's stovepipe hat off in the mud, and the last I heard of him he was at the insane asylum.

Another one of God's good workers met with a like fate near Spokane Falls. A couple of weeks ago I clipped a piece from the Spokane Review, and send the same in this letter:

H. L. Post, an aged member of the Salvation Army, was yesterday committed to the insane asylum at Medical Lake by Judge Moore of the superior court. Post is an old resident of the city and has been for some months past activly interested in the work of the Salvation Army. He was examined by Drs. Lockhart and Libby and pronounced insane. During the examination he became very greatly excited and accused his wife with being unfaithful.

I am proud of the noble work of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot get along without your paper. NELSON REQUA.

Freethinkers, Get Evidence.

COVELO, CAL., Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose $2, for which please send me books as follows: One "Candle from Under the Bushel," 50 cents; two copies "Bible Inquirer," 25 cents each, 50 cents; one Bible Picture Book, $1.

With the above amount of ammunition, I feel safe in saying that I will be able to hold the fort against all odds. I just delight in throwing shell in the enemy's camp when opportunity offers, and I often hav a little skirmish with my Christian friends, but they always retreat in bad order. It is really amusing to see their ignorance of the book in which they place all confidence. A few days ago a young doctor of this place heard me say that there was no one who could believe the Bible. He declared with great importance that he believed the Bible "from end to end." But I only asked him three or four questions until I had him so he could not answer without contradicting himself. He hung his head and walked off. If not wiser, he certainly lost much self-conceit. I am sometimes told by Christians who fail to keep up their end of the argument that I am a crank. I do not dispute them. I tell them all those that tell the truth about the Bible are cranks, and that does not seem to suit them. There is no doubt I would be considered as respectable as any Christian if I would only "keep my damned mouth shut" and not tell what I know about that miraculous book of miracles. I hav no use for any Infidels who through carelessness or indolence fail to post themselvs so they can defend their principles and help destroy fraud and superstition, when it costs so little to get the proper books, and so little time to study them. There are too many that are afraid to dispute anything a Christian may say, even if they are satisfied that it is untrue, because they do not know where to turn for evidence. Post yourselvs, brothers, and let us defend reason, truth, and liberty. IRA C. HOXIE.

P.S.—Please answer through your paper, Did R. G. Ingersoll ever hav a son die, and did he on his death-bed advise his son to die in the Christian faith?

On Liberal Meetings, and the Church Outlook.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Jan. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I do not like to miss a single number of your paper, for there is so much good reading. And right here let me say that THE TRUTH SEEKER never was better than just now.

I am glad to see that there are so many societies that hav lectures and a discussion following. I know from experience that such lectures are the best to get more light. To hav all kinds of subjects there discussed often brings out the most, the best thoughts, and givs a chance for a greater growth. We hav had such meetings in our city for several years, attended with the best results, growing more profitable every year. Our meetings are held every Sunday eve, and they are well reported for the different papers, so that every Monday hundreds and thousands read a fair synopsis of the lecture and what is said in the discussion. I would urge and recommend that more of these meetings be held in every town and city.

There never was a time when Freethought was so anxiously sought for as at present, and there never was a time when there was as much need for the spread of Liberal ideas as at present. For the church never was more activ for the suppression of Freethought than it is now, with all its different and most powerful organizations at work to suppress Liberalism. One of the strongest and most dangerous is the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

I am sorry to see so many that claim to be Liberal working in with the different churches. Even some of my brother and sister Spiritualists are doing the same thing. What are called the most liberal orthodox priests are in my mind the most dangerous to human progress, for they hold back those that are too liberal to believe in hell and damnation and a great God sitting on his throne, but teach that hell is a bad place and that God is a great ruling power of divine wisdom, etc. This kind of teaching will hold people back for years and years.

The plan of salvation is the same in all the churches, the most conservativ and the most liberal. And a belief in a God of any kind is the foundation of all superstition.

The liberal churches are more inconsistent with themselvs than the most conservativ. And I cannot see any consistent ground between absolute orthodoxy on the one hand and absolute freedom on the other hand. PROF. A. B. SEVERANCE.

The Smithsonian, and the Words "Religion" and "Church."

VAN BUREN, ARK., Jan. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this country hav been floundering for a long time, trying to find something that would just suit them. They hav tried the Liberal League, the Secular Union, and still all are not satisfied. I do hope that the present officers of the Secular Union may be able to accomplish something. I think we should giv them all the assistance possible in sympathy and material aid. But it has always appeared to me, as W. S. Wood says in your issue of January 16th, this year, "that the Secular Union has been loaded down with too many demands." As I understand him, and, further, as I hav always regretted, the Union's demands are negativ. Some of the demands are not positiv and purposiv like the purpose and design of the Smithsonian Institute, "The increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." And if all the lovers of knowledge would unite their efforts in the increase and diffusion of knowledge it would in my judgment be the best way possible to correct the evils of which we complain. Ignorance is the cause of all our woes. Perhaps but few of our friends know what an aid we may hav in the Smithsonian Institute. To such I would say, procure and read its reports, especially that of July, 1888. In the Smithsonian Institute we hav a model of just what we need: library, museum, reading-room, with a free platform, free to all, reserving only right to criticise. Liberals would do well to labor everywhere for the increase of the Smithsonian. Let it hav branches all over the land. It now has a system of exchange which should be vastly enlarged.

There is another thing that I hav thought of much and regretted, and that is to me the fastidiousness of many of our friends in regard to the use of the words "religion" and "church." What we want above all things is the religion of humanity and a church of humanity. I see no need of quibbling about the etymology of words. The essential idea of religion is devotion. We want good and true men and women devoted to humanity. One idea of a church is an organized body of persons or congregation. The term humanity would so modify the words that no one could be deceived. And in some cases this would help to giv us civil rights and relief from unnecessary odium. One of the grandest expressions in the language is, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." Does anyone think that the immortal Paine did not know the meaning of the word "religion," or that he wished to truckle to the church? It seems to me that there was no other word that would so fully giv expression to the fire of his soul.

HENRY SHIPLEY.

Fiat Money Defended.

COOK, NEB., Jan. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: What a pity friend Shumaker had not put in practice what the "great apostles" taught him to believe! For no man livs who has used his "reason, experience, and observation" but who knows that all legal tender (money), it matters not what the material upon which the sovereign impress is made, possesses the same legal-tender power in all cases and in all circumstances. What, my dear sir, became of your "reason, experience, and observation," if you failed in knowing that the legal-tender paper currency was bought and sold day by day for the same price all through the war—and, for that matter, ever since—the same as gold and silver, and on that memorable "Black Friday" when gold was quoted at $2.85, the legal-tender paper dollar sold for $2.85 on the same market? Your "reason," my dear sir, ought to tell you that that transaction was a fraud, a damnable device to rob somebody. That "experience," your "observation," ought to hav convinced you that it was not the paper, the silver, or the gold that was being bought and sold, but the function that money imparted to the paper, silver, and gold by the fiat—sovereignty of the people—law.

What you say of the John Law or French assignats and of the Argentine Republic would not be worth noticing were it not for the fact that you hav entirely failed to follow the teachings of "the great apostles" in observing the facts in these cases; because in neither case does the government recognize the paper as money. It does not in either case receive its impress of money as a sovereignty of law, and consequently is not a legal tender nor a legal money in any sense of the word.

What Dr. W. P. Brooks has written may, as you say, to you be a "revelation." But it is only a lack of "observation" on your part that causes you to so think. All the facts of science and all new ideas hav by many been looked upon as revelations from God only because of the abandoning of "reason, experience, and observation." The Supreme Court was in possession of the revelation long before Dr. Brooks. See what it says: "No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000 contracted before 1834 could be paid by one hundred eagles coined after that date, though they contain no more gold than ninety-four eagles such as were coined when the contract was made; and this, not because of the intrinsic value of the coin, but because of its legal value. . . . We hav been asked whether Congress can declare that a contract to deliver a quantity of grain may be satisfied by the tender of a less quantity. Undoubtedly not. But this is a false analogy. There is a wide difference between a tender of quantities or of specific articles and a tender of legal values"—money. So you see, my friend, that the "value of money" does not "depend upon the intrinsic value of the material of which money was made," and I get this fact, not from God and revelation, but from the highest judicial tribunal in the United States. In your "observation" you could hav received the same had you not been running after false gods. The error of your "observation" is made more plain by your saying, "Dr. Brooks tells us that gold and silver hav no intrinsic value." Dr. Brooks never said anything of the kind. But he did say that all the value money possesses is its legal value, etc. You need to be more observing, friend Shumaker. The Supreme Court further says: "Whatever power there is over the currency [money] is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated." Judge Joel Tiffany says: "Much has been said about paper money and gold, silver, and copper money; but all such language is deceptiv. There is no such thing, legally, as gold and silver money and paper money. Money, as the measure of price or value, is the sovereign authority impressed upon and attached to that which is capable of taking and retaining the impress of that authority. It is the recognized presence of sovereignty in the market and in the court, applying the measure and determining the equality of exchanges between subject and subject, peasant and prince, between crown and people. As a medium of exchange, or a means to an end, it has no value but the sovereign will recorded upon its face; and in respect to its use its value is as much unchangeable as the authority that created it. Its value being fixed by the will of the government, and not by the intrinsic qualities of that upon which it is impressed, legally it cannot vary." In the eyes of the Supreme Court, how ridiculous must appear your statements that money is "coined metal," and "that the value of money depended upon the intrinsic value of the material of which money was made."

This "new revelation" is already fixed in the Constitution and statutes of our country, and the Farmers' Alliance, God and Christ, also P. F. Shumaker, must keep their unholy hands off it. They can not say what the length, breadth, or depth of dollars shall be, but should they desire to let their "children," or, if you so desire, yourselvs, "build doll-houses of dollars," no one of good common sense will object. Fools and children can be amused for hours playing with dollars, and perhaps Gods and Christs, for aught I know; but intelligent people hav other uses for dollars as well. What you say about "cheap money" and "every man can make his own money"—whether you intended it for a sample of your wit or your wisdom I must say that in all my "experience and observation" I am unable to tell, and my "reason" tells me that you wrote it because you did not know any better. Because, in the first place, there is, there can be, no such thing as a cheap money. All money, as money, legally bears the same value. So to talk of cheap money is to talk like a fool. And as to making money yourself, my advice would be, you had better not try it unless you are desirous of wearing a checkered suit and working for your board inside of prison walls. Respectfully, W. P. BROOKS.

The Abominations of Christianity.

BRADFORD, PA., Jan. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Our good friend Professor Peck has paid us a visit and talked very amusingly upon "Spiritualism" for the benefit of the First Spiritualist church of Bradford, just inaugurated recently. I noticed a great falling off of the old orthodox tyrannical spirit that swayed the church in the past. His path "From Methodism to Spiritualism" has been a hard one, beset with numerous difficulties. He portrayed the force of habit—how one denomination kept their members in strict abhorrence of the members of all other sects. How the preachers used to giv vivid descriptions of the agonizing influences of everlasting hell for all those who were fortunate enough to be predestined there. How God—to his mind—used to sit on the edge of some fleecy cloud, his omnipotent brows corrugated in anger, with a scepter in his hand to consign to eternal perdition all those who merited his wrath. For a being of that character he could not find any love, although he did his utmost, but ever found it impossible. But for the being Christ he had a different feeling, though at the same time he taught that they were both God, one and the same. But through his great suffering on the cross his heart went out to him. And here he showed that Christ was the first great Spiritualist the world was blessed with. But through the church keeping its subjects in such abject ignorance, it was but lately found out by a few, who were fortunate enough to find it in the accuracy of spirit manifestation. This action on the part of the church he hated with all the bitterness of his compound admixture of spirit and clay. But he gave the church credit for keeping the spirit of religion alive in man—and this with a seeming kind of reluctance. But he was thankful he was born in an age when man could express his mind on all religious subjects without being accused of heresy and burnt at the stake for his honest opinions.

By and by, a step forward. He believed, he claimed, a great deal in the teachings of Ingersoll that matter and force are eternal, could never hav been created nor can never hav an end. He should be very careful; inasmuch as he is a believer in spirit existence the shade of Calvin may come after him with some or all of the Five Points. I like a great deal of his doctrin on this side of the grave, but when he crosses the "Jordan" he leaves me, and I think quite a number more, in the far rear. He is perfectly satisfied that he does know of an existence beyond the tomb. About this, however, we hav our doubts. What I like about Spiritualism, it does away with a hell and an angry God. This sect, in my opinion, is only a step or so removed from Atheism, and if they would be abreast with the current of modern thought by all means put a skylight in the roof of their church and let in a little more light on the slightly illiterate. They are all good people, doing the best they know how. But along with their theory goes the fact that the poor must, as well as the fairly circumstanced, be taxed to the utmost to keep the spiritual machinery in running order. This does not suit me. Where credulity is burdened to advance superstition, I say, Away with it. There has been enough agony and sweat expended in the world for foolish purposes already. I would suggest that the money they may gather in the future be put into a poor fund and with it buy bread for the needy.

I think this will be the next great church in the world. In it is liberty, to a certain extent. You can think for yourself and run no chances of being eternally damned. That idea is monstrous to contemplate, by or from an orthodox standpoint. But our Spiritualistic friends are going to do away with it; and if they succeed in this direction, to annihilate orthodox absurdity, it will giv to this church its grandest monument. It robs death of its horrible sting. It will dry the cheeks of the world of scalding tears. It givs wings to hope; bids the despondent be joyous, and points them to a better day in store for the truly righteous, and will cause hymns and psalms to be sung by nature's honest bands. And I will, in the way of not being misunderstood, quote a sample here:

O death, the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest, and the best;
Welcome the hour my aged limbs
Are laid with thee at rest;
The great, the wealthy, fear thy blows,
From pomp and pleasure torn;
But, oh, a blest relief to those
That weary-laden mourn!

The world is growing grander and better every day, even within my own recollections. And orthodoxy, to keep pace with Freethought, must keep within denouncing distance. That is why some of the churches are to-day standing in the footprints of Thomas Paine. Let me tell the church she must throw off the mask of bigotry. She must of necessity become more liberal. Her system of morals is all rot. Too many crimes are committed in her name. She givs too many inducements to commit evils, and hence too many evils are committed. She puts a premium on crime. "Whosesoever sins ye shall forgiv, they are forgiven." This forgivness she insists upon, and hides the crimes of all characters under her capacious cloak. And "Whosesoever sins thou shalt retain, they are retained." I suppose by this they are carried over to the heaven side of the ledger. But who in the name of common sense ever heard tell of the church ever retaining a sin on account of its enormity? I believe that murder is one of the greatest sins upon the calendar, but when one of these pious scoundrels is about to expiate his foul offense upon the gibbet we invariably find in his company before he is swung off one of our long, pale, pious, sanctimonious-faced sin-extracters paving the way for him to the New Jerusalem. And the sin against the Holy Ghost perhaps has never been committed, as I understand that is the one there is no forgivness for. Perhaps on account of us not being born again, we are unable to find it. It does seem as if this scheme of being born again would never bear any fruit. It has been preached for a few hundred years now, and if it does not bear fruit soon all confidence will be lost in it, even by the followers of the "meek and humble Jesus." Poor fellow, his lot is a hard one, to bear the sins of all those who hav cast their heap upon him. But the church he established eighteen hundred years ago likes comfort in looking through the thick mist of ignorance upon the maimed, wounded, and insane made by her hatred. She looks with her tear-bedimmed eyes upon the heaps of human bones whitening and bleaching beneath the sun and rain. It is monstrous to contemplate.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Slumber Song.

BY SUSAN H. WIXON.

Rest thee, darling, in my arms;
Safe thou art from all alarms:
Drooping, wearied, sleepy eyes,
Laughing, sparkling, since sunrise,
Now shall take a loving peep
In the charmed bow'r of sleep.
Rest thee, nest thee, soft and warm,
Sheltered here from every harm;
Cuddled close to mamma's breast,
Baby, darling, take thy rest.

Fast asleep, O, baby dear,
Like some fairy nestled here;
Soft I kiss thy rosy palm,
Quiet now in slumber calm;
Sweetest heart from land and sea,
Royal gifts I'd waft to thee.
Rest thee, nest thee, soft and warm,
Sheltered here from every harm;
Cuddled close to mamma's breast,
Baby, darling, take thy rest.

But, should life bring bitterness,
More of pain and less to bless;
Should the storm-king in his wrath
Sweep across my darling's path,
Here upon thy mother's breast
Always shalt thou find sweet rest.
Rest thee, nest thee, soft and warm,
Sheltered here from every harm;
Cuddled close to mamma's breast,
Baby, darling, take thy rest.

"Looking Backward."

My heart has lost its youthful glee,
My cheek is paled with tears,
My weary spirit turns to thee,
Home of my early years.

The gray rocks of my nativ home,
The flower-bespangled plain,
The green woods where I loved to roam,
Come o'er my heart again.

The mossy shed where I would play—
The tree before the door—
The great old barn, well stocked with hay,
I see them all once more.

I note my locks all silvery white,
Around my care-worn brow,
That brow once fair, those locks once bright—
Alas! so faded now.

And thou, the best and dearest one,
Through all my fancies wild
I cling to thee till life is done,
Mother of the wayward child.

PAXTON.

Legend.—Continued.

The love-bought experience of the raven, or as Camoens, a Spanish poet, remarks, "knowledge purchased with a tear," had given him a balance of faculties which astonished everyone, but while he slept in his gem-lined nest, a robber came and stole from Jane and Seth the costly jewels with which, childlike, they had adorned themselvs. The thief tried to climb a tree, but Ravy was too fast for him; he picked his flesh severely, and sent him flying, appealing, as the villain did, to his weak side, for Ravy loved the breeze which rocked him in the swaying branches.

People should honor our goodness, if we hav any, and not take advantage of defects. "Take my blessing," said the good bird; "then govern your passions with absolute sway, and grow wiser and better as life wears away." It was not long before Ravy built a house, with the help of good spirits, but Christians taxed him heavily before it was half done. Mrs. Murdoc, who never spoke the truth, praised the comfort of the rooms, while the wind whistled through the crevices; then she suffocated Jane in a small, close storeroom, until the child drooped and nearly died. An intelligent health-officer discovered the state of affairs. "Whether it is my business or not," said he, "I will stop this choking and murdering, which is decimating our population. People shall be fined heavily who shut doors on boarders or tenants. A nation which does not half breathe is fast falling into disease and decay. Think what it is to breathe foul air, saturated with nauseous gases, over and over; when the mountain wolf has all he wants as he bounds from crag to crag, "where leaps the live thunder." He loves the lightning, which knows his wants and does his errands. "Wretched Christian woman," said the raven to Mrs. Murdoc, "neglect this subject and others which aid benevolence, at your peril," and he tweaked her ear so that she staid from the place for three weeks. At length, his money being gone, Ravy sunk down weak and disheartened; the children wept and trembled, trying to comfort him. "We will all starve and die together," said Jane, as she held the lovely bird in her arms tenderly. Mrs. Murdoc sent them twenty-five cents, praising God who put it into her heart to aid the poor. Just then a miserable woman came out of a splendid Christian mansion with a dry crust in her hand, seeing which a policeman raised a great outcry against street beggars, saying, "I suppose this is the one who livs on oysters and costly fruit. Away with them!"

Said Seth, "Did you hear of the death of the young duke of Clarence? The Christian goodness of Henry VII., earl of Richmond, destroyed the true duke of Clarence. I would rather hear the cricket sing than pretend to inherit such a title." Hearing this the insects began to collect. A splendid light-green katydid scraped two shells over one another, which were on her back; these produced the sound "katy-did," her peculiar note. Then a large ant appeared and wounded the tender flesh of Jane's hand. "But I will not kill it," said she, "for Uncle Toby's sake." ALHAZA.

Biographical Sketches.

IX.—HEMANS.

Felicia Dorothea Brown, an English poetess, was born at Liverpool, England, on the 25th day of September, 1793. Her father was Irish and her mother partly German and partly Italian. She was a very precocious child in all respects, but remarkable in the line of poetry. Her poems written at the age of eight are almost as well composed and are said to possess fully as much literary merit as those written at the age of twenty-eight. The chief trouble with her poems is that they are written too fast and fluently for much display of genius. At the age of six she read, and was an enthusiastic admirer of, Shakspere. She composed and had published a very praiseworthy sonnet upon "The Bard of Avon." "England and Spain, or Valor and Patriotism," was written at the age of fourteen.

The disposition of this child-poet is reported as remarkably sweet and affectionate. She was a passionate lover of all the fine arts, though poetry was a favorit theme. At the age of eleven she was taken to London, and upon one occasion was taken into a gallery of sculpture to view the statuary. Those who witnessed her first introduction into the gallery were struck by the impulsiv "Hush! hush!" as, with finger upon her lips, she gazed with awed admiration upon the scene.

When she grew older and had taken the name of Hemans, Sir Walter Scott once said to her: "I should say you had too many gifts, Mrs. Hemans, if they were not used in giving pleasure to others."

And as to a description of her looks, I will quote from Mrs. L. H. Sigourney:

"Exceedingly beautiful was she in her youth. On her fair rounded cheek was the tint of the opening rose; her eyes were suffused with brilliance; natural curls, of a rich sunny brown, fell in profusion over brow and shoulder; every movement bespoke grace, every feature glowed with intelligent and varying expression. At the age of fifteen, when each unfolding charm presaged a still brighter bloom, she became acquainted with Captain Hemans, an English officer, who was introduced to her family while on a visit to the neighborhood. The most impassioned admiration on his part was the result, and its fervent expression from a young man of fine person and education was not lost upon an artless, susceptible heart." But so much for the poet's early life. Sufficient it is to say that, owing to the young girl's tender age, her parents and friends objected, and the young officer went to Spain, and for three years the young lovers did not see one another or hold any communication. But when the three years was up, in 1812, Captain Hemans returned to England and renewed the courtship. The parents, touched probably by their constancy, reluctantly gave their consent to the marriage. Which was only justifiable, say I.

Perhaps it would hav been better if the parents had never given their consent, and poor, disappointed Felicia in duty bound had remained a maiden all her life. Certain it was that Captain Hemans "held a daisy in his hand and carelessly flung it away," and never realized what a precious daisy he held. After a few short happy years (they are supposed to hav been happy, but not anyone really knows whether they were or not; one can only conjecture), Captain Hemans, who was in ill health, decided to go to Italy, as he believed a warmer climate would be beneficial, and took up his abode in Rome. And from the day that he sailed, for seventeen years afterward, his wife never saw his face any more. Whether Captain Hemans had intended that this should happen beforehand or not, history again fails to tell. On the effect it had on Mrs. Hemans, or rather in excuse for not giving a description of the effect that it produced upon her, for the inquisitiv public, I will again quote from Mrs. Sigourney:

"The pangs that such a change must hav wrought in a heart nurtured from cradle hours by the fondest sympathy, and from its own exquisit structure involving the necessity of loving and being loved, are not for us to depict."

She was of course more fortunate than most deserted wives. Her talents helped to console her, which is indeed a great deal. There is nothing more true than this quotation:

"Work bids storms of grief be still."

And of course work that you love is more consoling.

But before I consume any more valuable space, allow me to speak of Mrs. Hemans's strong affection for children, and also the strong confiding love the little ones had for her. She made it an especial duty to take morning rambles with her children, and when she did other little ones would come too. One little peasant girl used to watch for the "sweet lady" every morning and taking her hand would walk contentedly by her side, until growing tired she would quietly go home, but not without frequent smiles and backward glances.

Mrs. Hemans died on Jan. 11, 1827. Died as calmly and peacefully as she had lived. Hushed and awe-stricken, her children watched her life go out. Go out! But she left a stainless, pure, and sweet record, that we might all do well to imitate.

Correspondence.

TOPEKA, KAN., Jan. 15, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now write a few lines to the Corner to let you all know there is still another Infidel. A great many of my friends talk to me and try to change my mind in belief. They say, "Martha, if I only could get you to read the Bible, you would change your mind." But I say it is no use; that is something I never will do. Well, father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nine years, and I enjoy reading it. And I also hav got the "Story Hour," which I think lots of, and some time I intend to get "Apples of Gold." Well, I will close. Wishing you success, I remain, as ever,

Your loving friend,
MARTHA GILL.

CANON CITY, COL., Jan. 21, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: It is so long since my name appeared in the Corner I fear the friends hav forgotten me. By way of introduction: Early in December last we had a county school contest. There were several liberal prizes offered. They were for orations and declamations. In the orations originality was the principal test. I subscribe myself one of the defeated orators. Some fair-minded people pronounced the decision very unfair and unjust. I hand you my speech delivered on that occasion—"A Dream." It was my first effort of that kind. The little verses are my first poetry. If you think it suitable and not too long please giv it a place in the Corner. Very truly,
ORELLA LOCKE.

FROM OSCAR THE BRAVE.

ASPEN, COL, Jan. 20, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I will write a few lines to the Children's Corner to let you know what kind of a schoolteacher I hav. She is very religious, and religion is all that she talks about. Last week she was to tell the school about miracles, but before she began reading she asked me what a miracle was. I told her it was a foolish story like fairy tales. Then she asked me what a soul was. I told her it was something supposed to exist in the human body. I do not think she will let me keep up with my class. I hav received letters from some Liberals since my last letter to the Children's Corner. One of the letters was from W. A. Carlton, and the other from Mary Robinson. I wrote a letter to W. A. Carlton just before I wrote this one.

Yours truly, OSCAR KINDRICK.

JORDAN, MINN., Jan. 8, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My aunt takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am thirteen years old. My grandpa was a great lover of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He died a year ago last September. My papa has been dead for seven years. I hav three sisters, all younger than myself. We hav no Liberals around here. We liv so far from school that I can not go to school, although my mamma teaches me at home. I study history, grammar, arithmetic, spelling, geography, and writing. Well, my letter is already too long, so I will close. Hoping this will escape the wastebasket, I remain,

Your Liberal friend,
MABEL B. KNOTT.

HARTFORD, KAN., Jan. 17, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over a year, yet hav never written to the Children's Corner, although thinking of it many times. My father has been a contributor to your paper for some time, and I suppose by his writings you know our belief. I am not going to school at present. I graduated in the Hartford high school in the spring of 1891, April the 25th, at the age of sixteen. My studies were philosophy, chemistry, geology, zoölogy, geometry, astronomy, algebra, and rhetoric, besides all the smaller studies, arithmetic, grammar, and many others. I am now studying Latin, trigonometry, and general history at home.

One who has not studied the sciences can scarcely realize the true beauty of life. The higher mathematics are the most interesting to me. I was the only Freethinker in the class of twenty, and I am indeed proud to be called the follower of Thomas Paine.

My favorit of all amusements is dancing.

Father left Wednesday for Phœnix, Ariz., where he goes on a prospecting tour and to look for a location. We intend to go soon.

As this is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER I will close for fear of the wastebasket. I would like to correspond with several Liberals of different localities.

Your friend in the Liberal cause,
DAISY DARROW.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 17, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Esteemed Friend: This is a cold, dreary Sunday, and while sitting here in my room, watching the tiny snowflakes playing in front of my window, and the merry little birds hopping and twittering about in the lawn, I concluded to hav another talk with you and the readers of the Corner.

The present winter, here in Kansas, has, for the most part, been an unusually pleasant one. It has seemed more like spring than winter. This is, however, a very cold day, and I believe the remainder of the winter will be very unpleasant.

I think the grand old TRUTH SEEKER is very attractiv in its new dress. The typography is excellent, and the advertisements are so arranged as to not fail to attract attention. I see in the last Corner a very interesting and instructiv article by our noble young foreign friend, Mr. E. dos Santos, of Trinidad. The asphalt lake which he describes must be a wonderful freak of nature, and no doubt the readers of the Corner were much interested in Mr. Santos's graphic description of it.

Mr. Santos has designed a neat little badge for the Brotherhood of Moralists of Hannibal, Mo., and the emblem is very appropriate. It consists of a representation of the globe, suspended in a star-like circle, and around the globe is a belt or girdle, on which are engraved the letters "B. M." I see in the Freethought papers that Miss Ella E. Gibson, editor of the Moralist, the official organ of the Brotherhood, is seriously ill. Miss Gibson has done good work for the cause of mental freedom, and she deserves the sympathy of every Freethinker in the land in her present suffering. It is to be hoped that she will soon recover.

I see in the Corner a nice little letter from Rosa Remsburg, of Daleville, Ind. Rosa is a bright girl for her age, and she is a genuin Freethinker. She is my cousin. Havn't I a right to be proud of such a cousin? I hope the project for a children's paper has not been given up. I only wish I was able to advance the necessary funds to start such a paper. It is to be hoped that some of the Freethinkers who hav the means, and who are interested in the advancement of the young, will aid in getting up a neat little magazine for them. Who can estimate the amount of good such a paper would be capable of doing, and especially when under the management of such an able teacher as Miss Wixon? If such a paper should spring up I would be one of the first to subscribe. With best wishes to all, I remain, Your Liberal friend,

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

News of the Week.

IN New York city complaints continue against the systematic neglect of the Catholic-Tammany government to provide sufficient schools to seat applicants.

REPAYMENT of the $5,000,000 that Chicago is asking of Congress depends materially on Sunday opening, which would double the net (not the gross) receipts.

JOHN MCELRATH, of New York city, has been arrested on the charge of burglary, the evidence being a prayer-book which he always carried left on the floor behind him.

THE coming revision of the Belgian constitution, brought about by a determined demand of the working classes for the enactment of universal suffrage, may lead to insurrection, and this to a European war.

ON Sunday, the 14th, during services before the German emperor in his court chapel, a man rose and cried, "Your words are useless; behold, the millennium is at hand." He was found insane on religion.

THE Vatican has officially approved Dr. Holaind's magazine article advocating parochial schools, and strongly takes the ground that Catholic children must be educated in Catholic and not in public non-Catholic schools.

AT Lima, O., on the 14th, Mrs. Bentzel died from the over-exertion of attempting to leave her sick-bed healed by faith at the command of her brother, a faith-cure believer. He had dismissed the physician on beginning his course of prayer.

THE latest new religion is that of the Disciples of the Flying Roll, which is making converts in Michigan and Indiana. Its Bible, "The Flying Roll," by Jas. J. Jezreel, an Englishman, warns all to flee to Detroit, Mich., which is the City of Deliverance, against the day of destruction. The local leader calls himself Michael X-Over-Mills.

IT is learned from Chili that the clericals were a strong element in the party that pulled down Balmaceda. They suspected him of Freethinking; and he had cut down their revenues, by substituting civil for religious marriage and otherwise. "Thus it came to pass," says a dispatch, "that as the priests in Chili hold unlimited sway over the minds of the female population, a Balmacedist in petticoats was almost as rare a phenomenon as a black swan."

A COMMITTEE of the Minneapolis city council advises opening theaters Sundays, saying, "Some work one day and rest six. Your committee regard it as a self-evident proposition that those who merit the greatest consideration from the state are those who work the most. . . . Your committee farther finds that 'one man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.'"

A STRONG case has been made out that the Heidt family committed the late murder of George Markert in Sullivan county, N. Y., in the belief that he practiced sorcery. The Heidts are ignorant and superstitious. They had a grudge against Markert as a hexenmeister, or wizard, who had by his unholy arts blasted their crops, diseased their cattle, and otherwise harmed them. They had accused him of being a midnight visitor to a hexenkanzel, or witch pulpit, in the neighborhood, where adepts in the satanic arts met to say their incantations against those whom they wished to harm.

NEARLY a hundred cases of malignant typhus and a dozen of black small-pox hav occurred in New York city among the immigrant Jews from the districts in Russia where those maladies are raging. Their spread here is feared. By these diseases, and famin, the inhabitants of Samara, Saratov, Charkov, Kazama, and Nijini-Novgorod are dying by thousands. When any food arrives its transportation to sufferers is often impossible because the horses hav been killed and eaten. The communal councils sell for their private enrichment the supplies sent, and the famishing are left to perish.

CATHOLICS express indignation that in Catholic countries the intelligent few who are unbelievers control the government. La Revista Cattolica, of Las Vegas, N. M., calls on the faithful to overturn this state of things. Another journal says: "Why is it that a small number of activ, energetic, determined workers are to-day ruling the world, while the Catholics are the majority of the governed? Ask the Socialists, the Garibaldians, the Jews, who control the daily press in Italy. Why is it that a few Infidels and Freemasons are driving the religious from the hospitals and other institutions of France? Because Catholics are apathetic and indifferent."

The Greenville, Ill., Sun prints the following letter:

NEW YORK, Feb. 2, 1892.

REV. THOMAS HYNES, Greenville, Ill., Dear Sir: My attention was called to-day to a report of a sermon delivered by you a few days ago in which you are reported as saying: "It is known that Colonel Ingersoll is especially hostil to the Calvinistic creed and church. I hav often read his explanation of this—that his father was so intensely orthodox that it drove his son clear over to his intense hatred of all Calvinists," etc.

I write simply to say that I hav never made such an explanation, or anything like it Nothing of this kind has ever been spoken or written by me. It is not true. My father was not a Calvinist. As a matter of fact he held Calvinism in great contempt.

I do not write this letter on account of what you are pleased to say about me personally, but simply to contradict the statement that I ever used any such expression concerning my father.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Colonel Talks Politics.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was in Buffalo, N. Y. He was asked: "What is your opinion of Blaine's letter of withdrawal?"

"Of course it is genuin," he answered. "I suppose that Blaine is carrying out his great doctrin of reciprocity. He had his chance in 1884, and now, acting on the reciprocal idea, he wants to giv somebody else a show. From this you see that Blaine practices what he preaches. He has probably found out by experience that office is not the father and mother of happiness."

"What effect will it hav on Harrison's candidacy?"

"I do not think it will help Harrison unless Blaine uses his influence for Harrison. There is a good deal of doubt upon that point in my mind. The withdrawal of Blaine leaves an open field, and the crop of candidates will be large. If Blaine keeps his hands off, Mr. Harrison will hav plenty of competition. Most of our people think that one term is enough. It seems to me that an average man ought to be satisfied with one term, and I think most of the people agree with me on that question. But to-day I am thinking more about poetry than politics. Shakspere has crowded out of my mind the Harrisons and Hills. I am on the banks of the Avon and care but little about the Potomac."

"Do you think this letter presents Blaine's final decision and eliminates him entirely from the field of possible candidates?"

"Of course I do. Blaine need not stoop to any pretense. He is the most popular man in the party, and can hav the nomination if he wants it, or if he will take it. Obviously he does not want it, and after having said so he cannot afford to take it under any circumstances. Political coquetry does not pay. Blaine has been too long in the field to pretend to hide blushes with a fan."

"Who, in your opinion, will be the Democratic candidate?"

"I know nothing about Democratic candidates. I think, however, that Hill has hurt himself by his winter convention. It will cool a good many friends. The Democrats, to use a Western expression that probably originated in New England, said to Hill: 'Rake it down, but don't snatch.'"

"Do you think the Democracy will find it advisable to nominate a Western man?"

"Of course there are a great many good men in the West, and Western men are apt to hav popular ways. The West furnished Lincoln, and Douglas, Grant, Sheridan, and hundreds of others who hav helped make our country illustrious, and the West is perfectly willing to keep on furnishing men to fill all places from postmaster to president."

"What do you consider the Republican chances for success?"

"If the Republicans nominate a good man, I think they will elect him."

A Great Musician's Estimate of a Great Orator.

Edward Remenyi, the celebrated violin virtuoso, now on a tour in this country, is a scholar as well as a musician. Being asked in a recent interview to name his favorit composer, he instantly replied: "Beethoven, the Shakspere of music." This led him into a dissertation on the men to whom modern civilization owes most, and these he limited to four—Dante, Shakspere, Michael Angelo, and Beethoven. "Hav you ever thought," he said, "that all of our philosophy, all of our adages and all of our crystallized wisdom is to be found in Shakspere? And that brings me to something you may not care to quote, but what is nevertheless my sincere belief—that the people of the United States hav not yet learned to appreciate Robert Ingersoll for what he is worth. I speak without reference to his religious convictions, but simply as a man of gigantic brain, and whom I consider the greatest living master of the English language in the world. I know him well. I stay at his home when in New York, and therefore I hav an opportunity of studying the man just as he is. When he speaks but two words, even, they hav wings and soar away up into the blue heavens. And what a thoughtful, considerate man, heedful of little things, he is. Look at this telegram he sent me the other day: 'The house has been full of music since you left.'" The abrupt transition from Shakspere to Ingersoll is explained to those who know the latter to be a master of Shaksperian literature, but may be less clear to those who hav known him only as a wonderful orator or an enemy of orthodox religion.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT old people say you cannot do, you try and find out that you can.—Thoreau.

IT is impossible for me to imagin a greater monster than the God of the Old Testament. He is unworthy of my worship. He commands only my detestation, my execration, and my passionate hatred. The God who commanded the murder of children is an infamous fiend. The God who believed in polygamy, is worthy only of contempt. The God who established slavery should be hated by every free man. The Jehovah of the Jews was simply a barbarian, and the Old Testament is mostly the barbarous record of a barbarous people.—Ingersoll.

I FLATTER myself, O Lord, that I hav made it quite clear to you that your Book is not by any means the oldest volume in the world. You were not the first author. Queen Mentuhept of Egypt was born and suckled, was wedded, and she died and was embalmed before you were invented, or at all events before, as a puny tribal God, you had emerged from the ark or box in which your Hebrew devotees cadged you up and down in their barbarous and predatory wanderings. And Queen Mentuhept, out of a Bible which was written before you were invented, before your son had cut his eye-teeth and your ghost had done wearing pinafores, had an extract inscribed upon her coffin. It is exceedingly fortunate for you that there were numerous volumes in existence before you slung your inkhorn and commenced to produce your Book, for originality is not your forte, and plagiarism is certainly your foible. There is, O Lord, a dash of rough candor about you, now and again; so you hav pretty freely, in the Old Testament, admitted the sources from which you derived the materials for your work; but, in your omniscience, you hav permitted all the works to which you were indebted to get lost. The "Book of Jasher" (see Joshua x, 13; 2 Sam. i, 18) is gone, the "Book of Iddo" (see 2 Chron. xii, 15) has vanished, and the "Acts of Uzziah" (see 2 Chron. xxvi, 22) is no more; so we hav no means of ascertaining how far you hav been indebted to these works, or of finding out whether you hav always quoted correctly. You hav, in your time, boasted, "I will send them strong delusions, that they may believe a lie;" so that I, for one, to be candid with you, am not quite satisfied that you hav always quoted correctly, and it may be that some of the books you pretend to derive your information from never existed. When you began to write your Book, or, at all events, to collect materials for it, you were only an insignificant Jewish godling that had no proper shrine or temple, but who, as I hav said, went cadging about in the inside of a shittim-wood box, with the images of two cherubim or heavenly hens sitting on the lid of it. Were Jasher and Iddo and Uzziah respectable persons, the lugging in of whose names gave weight and credit to a then undeveloped and insignificant God-in-the-Box? You had, O Lord, by the time you sat down to write the New Testament, left behind you the simple candor of your youth. There you do not, as in the Old Testament, advise us as to the authorities from which you draw. You would apparently hav us believe that the work is boldly original, all done by you, or the ghost, assisted by the "holy men of God." But, O Lord, the pretension is fraudulent, and you hav been found out. There is an Apocryphal New Testament quite as large as your New Testament, and quite as sane and quite as creditable. Having carefully read that Apocryphal New Testament, I find it so alarmingly like your New Testament that, if it had not been that the sagacious Council of Trent had determined by vote which was your Book and which was the book concocted by the early monks and the Apostolic Fathers, nobody nowadays would hav known which volume was by them, and which by the ghost and "holy men of God."—Saladin in God and His Book.

D. M. BENNETT'S WORKS.

ADDRESS THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

A Truth Seeker Around the World. Four large volumes. With steel-plate engraving of the author in Vol. I, and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. 1,075 pages, 8vo. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church; Their Crimes and Persecutions. 8vo. 1,119 pages. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5.00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8.00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price, $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the Gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon Mr. Bennett. Price, cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 50 cts.

An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. 5 cts.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. Being 3,000 questions propounded to his Jewish Godship upon a great variety of subjects. Cloth, 75 cts.

Deacon Skidmore's Letters. First Deacon of Zion Hill Baptist church, giving many church incidents and his evolution from Christianity to Liberalism. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh: also the Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truthseekers. Cloth, $1.

The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers. 10 cents.

Open Letter to Samuel Colgate. 10 cents.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER AROUND THE WORLD.

Four Large Volumes,

With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Volume I, and each volume containing forty to fifty illustrations.

By D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc., etc.

Handsomely bound, red cloth, $6 50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which contains an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth, it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Sample Prayer by the Machine.

O Lord, our Heavenly Father; We know thou art not partial to new inventions, and that thou hast an old grudge against graven images, but in this age of progress and labor-saving devices, we beseech thee to throw aside thy prejudices and not be jealous of thy servant, the machine, because it is fashioned somewhat after thy image, for we assure thee that the inventor meant no reflection on thy majesty or disregard for thy personal appearance, but it was his intention to furnish a mouthpiece as a substitute for the parson and to do away with middlemen in transacting business between this world and the next.

Thou knowest, O Lord, in times past that religious ingenuity has been chiefly directed in inventing instruments of torture, but more humane ideas hav at last robbed religious machinery of its terrors, and we here present ourselvs to the piously inclined, believing we are able to perform the praying business with neatness and dispatch.

Thou art also aware, O Lord, that in these days we hav an overproduction of very tiresome and useless drones, known as priests, parsons, and chaplains, whose prayers are not only dull and lugubrious, but also costly and a grievous burden to many of the taxpayers of this country. Therefore, O Lord, we hope that we will fill a long-felt want by superseding high-salaried prayer-makers and furnishing a better article at a trifling cost. O Lord, we know not whether thou hast ever heard of the United States Congress or not, but if not, we advise thee not to seek a too intimate acquaintance, lest thy opinion of this nation should fall considerably below par. But, Lord, if peradventure, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, thou hast heard rumors concerning this Congress, thou hast probably a suspicion that there arises a perfume which is not altogether as a sweet savor unto thee, for verily, O Lord, we beg to inform thee that this august and robust body of law-breaking law-makers are a pretty tough lot of vain and bald-headed sinners, whose consciences hav been dead so long that the odor thereof hath become a stench in the nostrils of honest men. Now, O Lord, let not thy anger be kindled just now, nor be too hasty about spilling thy fire and brimstone upon them; for we confess that we are convinced that quite a number of them are more upright than thy servant Lot was, and besides, O Lord, thou must remember that our Congressmen labor so zealously to escape the wiles of the bribe-giver, and of strange women, and to get rid of the surplus, that lo! they are weary and feel constrained to keep a hired man to talk to thee for them, for which favor they feel too poor to pay themselvs, but lay the burden thereof on the taxpayers. Now, O our father, if thou hast any influence with this Congress, we beseech thee to bless them with a larger sense of justice, and shed abroad in their hearts a little of the religion of common sense, and move them to consider their ways and be honest enough to pay for their own praying or adopt the machine in the interest of economy and reform, that their example may be as a shining light unto state legislators and all those who employ prayer-makers at the expense of others.

In conclusion, O Lord, we ask thee to take this matter under consideration, and act upon it at thy earliest convenience, and for Christ's sake, and the sake of these thy suffering people, move this Congress to adopt the machine, and thine be the glory, the honor, and profits. Amen.

Mr. Freshman and One of His Converts.

The chief manager of the Jew-converting mission in St. Mark's place is becoming discouraged. Mr. A. Benjamin's efforts are telling. Not only has the Independent supplemented the criticisms of the Jewish journals and THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the Herald has found time to interview Mr. Freshman, and incidentally room to print the Independent's remarks. In the interview Mr. Freshman says he is inclined to withdraw from his pastorate. This is what he said to the reporter who showed him the paragraph in the Independent, reprinted in these columns:

"Now, I do not desire to discuss this persecution, but it seems that there is an imperativ necessity for doing so. All this trouble grows out of the bitter malignity of one man, A. Benjamin, who for years has pursued me like an evil genius. What or who he is I cannot say. It is reported that he is an agent of wealthy Hebrew religionists, who aim through him to break up my church.

"STINGING POSTAL CARDS.

"This man wrote an article in the Jewish Messenger and influenced poor Isaac Long to make his false affidavit against me. He has also, in some unaccountable way, secured the coöperation of the Christian Independent. See this." Here the Rev. Mr. Freshman showed the following postal card message received by him on February 6th:

"'It affords me the greatest pleasure to inform you that to-day's Jewish Messenger contains two columns of the greatest importance to you and your glorious work among the lost sheep of Israel. Glory Hallelujah. THE TRUTH SEEKER, too, contains a fine editorial about you and your work, but it is too sinful a paper for you to read. Yours in praying, A. BENJAMIN.'

"On the morning this postal card message reached me young Hugo Cohen, a new convert and worker with us, received a postal card addressed to the 'Rev. Hugo Cohen, D.D., LL.D.,' and reading:

"'MY DEAR BROTHER: Sing ye to the Lord for the contents of to-day's Jewish Messenger and TRUTH SEEKER. Read it and let us pray. A. BENJAMIN.'

"As to the statements made in the Independent, I pronounce them one and all false. None of my converts has renounced Christianity. I hav prepared a formal statement which will be submitted to a meeting of our advisory and managerial boards, at the head of which is the Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems. I am inclined to withdraw from my pastorate."

The affidavit of Isaac Long, a Russian Jew, sets forth that he allowed himself to be baptized in London for thirty shillings, after which he came to New York and applied to Mr. Freshman for assistance. His affidavit says:

"He received me with open arms and open pocket. After receiving odd sums of money, he installed me as a regular salaried 'assistant.' I was quartered at his branch in Suffolk street, but my duties extended to places elsewhere. Thus, during the convention of last November I rendered valuable service nightly. On Wednesday, November 11th, Mr. Freshman requested me before the service began to deliver a stirring testimony. Accordingly, after the service he beckoned me to follow him to the vestry, where he handed me four silver half dollars and one paper dollar. My entire earnings during the week for testimonies amounted to $14. I also received $3 from Mr. Freshman for writing an insulting letter to Mr. Benjamin.

"In the meantime I was approached by Mr. Herman Warzaviack, a rival missionary, who is conducting a Jewish mission under the auspices of the 'City Mission.' Mr. Warzaviack agreed to pay me liberally provided I am willing to defame the character of his rival, Mr. Freshman. I cheerfully closed the bargain with my new master and became the sworn enemy of my old one. The rules prevailing at the rival missions are identical. Telling the truth in both houses is strictly prohibited. The only addition I discerned in my new master was that his morality was anything but Christian.

"Many supporters of the Jewish mission will no doubt treat my statement with contempt, under the plea that no reliance could be placed upon a backslider. But I implore you, dear Christians, why should the Jewish convert be credited when he is telling falsehood for gain and doubt his veracity when he is telling the truth at a loss to himself? The treasury of the missionary fund is certainly locked in my face, while the treasury of the Jewish mission funds will never be opened, as it never existed. I declare before God and man that I am more sinned against than sinner. The examples shown by every Jewish missionary is enough to demoralize anybody. With want and starvation staring me in the face, I declare before God and man that should it be possible for the Christian community to maintain dives of the Billy McGlory design, they could do no worse than maintain missionaries of the Freshman and Warzaviack pattern. My present action ought, I believe, prove my veracity. I am making my statement under oath, and am fully aware of the penalty of perjury. I am, however, ready and willing to face the accused missionaries in public and corroborate my assertions. Should they be able to deny my accusations, I will cheerfully undergo any term in states prison for perjury as prescribed by law.

"ISAAC LONG.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of January, 1892.

"TIMOTHY A. FAY,
"Notary Public, New York County."

In view of this statement and others which hav been published revealing the swindling character of the mission, so far as making converts among the Jews, it would seem to be eminently proper that Mr. Freshman should carry out his threat and resign his pastorate.

An Iniquitous Measure.

For years Anthony Comstock has been trying to enlarge his powers of persecution and to establish through the post-office a censorship of which he should be the real head. At almost every session of Congress he has had some pious member introduce an amendment to his original statute which should giv him the power he seeks. The following is a copy of his last and worst:

"52D CONGRESS,
"1ST SESSION. H. R. 120.

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVS.
"JANUARY 5, 1892.

"Read twice, referred to the committee on the post-offices and post-roads, and ordered to be printed.

"Mr. Henderson, of Iowa, introduced the following bill:

"A BILL

"To amend section thirty-eight hundred and ninety-three of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section thirty-eight hundred and ninety-three of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"(New matter in italics).

"SEC. 3893. Every obscene, lewd, filthy, indecent, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent or filthy character or devoted to the publication or principally made up of criminal news, police reports, or accounts of criminal deeds, or pictures and stories of immoral deeds, lust, or crime, and every article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, and every article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use, and every written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where or how, or of whom, or by what means any of the hereinbefore-mentioned matters, articles, or things may be obtained or made, or advertisement contained in any newspaper, pamphlet, or circular giving information where or by whom abortion may be performed, or where pills, medicin, nostrums, or advice for the prevention of conception or for abortion may be obtained, or advertisements of medicins, drugs, nostrums, or apparatus for the cure of private or venereal diseases, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails nor delivered from any post-office nor by any letter-carrier; and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same, or cause the same to be taken, from the mails, for the purpose of circulating or disposing of, or aiding in, the circulation or disposition of the same, shall, for each and every offense, be fined upon conviction thereof not more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and all offenses committed under the section of which this is amendatory, prior to the approval of this act, may be prosecuted and punished under the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed: and the Postmaster-General shall hav full authority to declare what matter is nonmailable under this act, so far as the transportation in the mails is concerned: Provided, That nothing in this act shall authorize any person to open any letter or sealed matter of the first class not addressed to himself: And provided further, That upon the continued mailing of newspapers or periodicals containing advertisements or other articles or items forbidden by this act to be transmitted in the mails, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to declare said publication, including future issues thereof, nonmailable."

It will be seen by scanning the italicized portions of this bill that publishers would be practically at the mercy of Comstock and the postmaster-general. The word "indecent" is of such a broad meaning that it would take in a Roman Catholic blood atonement picture or one of Jonathan Edwards's sermons on hell. It would depend on the jury. But it would certainly take in all the daily papers if district attorneys could be found who would dare undertake their prosecution.

The second addition to the law is aimed at such papers as the Police Gazette, a journal that we should at once brand as indecent, but which thousands of other people, with just as good right to select their reading matter as we hav, read with delight. Their taste is not admirable, but that is their business.

The third addition puts nearly all the daily and weekly newspapers in the country at the mercy of Comstock. There are very few papers which do not advertise patent medicins and doctors who perform miraculous cures. But people must be their own judges of whom to patronize. It is no part of a republican government to furnish a club in the shape of a law for irresponsible private agents to blackmail either publishers or doctors.

But the worse thing in the bill is the power given the postmaster-general. He is made the poohbah of publishing. He has the power of the Russian censor. He can stop the mailing of not only any particular issue of a paper, but its future issues. That is, he can destroy the business of any publisher he pleases. What a chance for blackmail in subordinates, who really do the supervising, including such agents of Paul-pry societies as Comstock would hav!

This outrageous bill is now before the House of Representativs Committee on Post-offices and Post Roads, composed of the following gentlemen: J. S. Henderson, of Ga., chairman; J. H. Blount, Va.; B. A. Enloe, Tenn.; R. P. C. Wilson, Mo.; E. J. Dunphy, N. Y.; John D. Anderson, W. Va.; Elijah V. Brookshire, Ind.; John C. Kyle, Miss.; John M. Pattison, O.; John C. Crosby, Mass.; A. J. Hopkins, Ill.; John A. Caldwell, O.; John L. Wilson, Wash.; C. A. Bergen, N. J.; C. F. Loud, Cal., and John T. Caine, Utah.

These men may all be addressed House of Representativs, Washington, D. C., and they should be addressed promptly from every state in the Union and by everyone who values or is willing to defend the freedom of the press and mails, and who objects to a Russian censorship over the publications they prefer to read. With the word "indecent" in the statute, and armed with Benedict's definition of obscenity, there is not a book worth reading that could not be suppressed, if the right jury could be obtained before the right judge. The Canadian fools hav held Colonel Ingersoll's writings to be indecent, and there are fools in the United States as well as over the northern border.

We hope our readers will get in the spirit of writing letters to their representativs. It is the most effectiv way of influencing ordinary legislation. And those proposed amendments ought to be killed. We hav outlined but a few of the many reasons for it. Others will suggest themselvs, though letters to public men should be short and to the point. Write to the member of the committee from your state, and from those states not represented on the committee write to the chairman. Let us kill the bill!

New York's Legislature and the World's Fair.

Not a day too soon, in fact, not quite in time, did we warn the Freethinkers of this state of the Sabbatarian attempt to close New York's exhibit at the World's Fair by law. Watching their chance, the bill was sprung upon the assembly when known pietists were in the greater force, and passed by the small majority of two.

Afterward the bill was tabled and the fight is not lost. The bill will come up again, and in the mean time let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the state and all his or her friends write to their assemblymen not to vote to close New York's exhibit.

The discussion of the measure in the assembly was interesting. The Herald's report thus describes it:

"As soon as the bill [making the $300,000 appropriation for the exhibit] was reached Mr. Deyo, the highly conscientious member from Broome, moved an amendment which directed that the exhibit of this state should not be open to the public on Sunday.

"Leader George Bush, who is notably fair-minded and broad on all such questions, protested that the question should be left entirely to the commissioners having the exhibit in charge. 'We hav decided to hav a representativ display at this great exhibition,' he said, 'and it is unwise to tie up our commissioners. They are able men and competent to judge what is best in this matter.'

"'It might just as well be understood,' replied Mr. Deyo, 'that those managers are our servants, and that we are entitled to represent to them the sentiments of the people of this stat That the fair did not go to New York was due to the fact that the people wanted it kept free from partisan influences. Mr. Bush knows that, and I am glad to see that his conscience pricks him. There are others besides himself who see their mistake now. It is not the Chicago exhibit of which we are speaking, but the New York state exhibit, and the people of this state are opposed to Sunday opening.'

"'Public sentiment on this question has changed a great deal in a short time,' interposed Mr. Hitt. 'There was some objection to Sunday opening at the fair at first, but it is fast fading away. The idea is too narrow. I will go as far as anyone to preserve the sanctity of the Sabbath, but the case in hand does not appeal to my sympathies. I believe it will be far better to hav the people of all nations who visit this great exhibition spend their Sunday looking at our exhibit than to spend it in the saloons, as they will surely do if the exhibit is closed. It is wrong to tie up our commissioners as this amendment proposes. I don't believe in instructing delegates.'"

"'But you always do instruct them,' broke in General Husted.

"'No, we don't,' retorted Mr. Hitt. 'We hav a lot of delegates coming to our convention on Monday and they are not instructed, but they will vote right when the time comes.' This break was greeted with roars of derisiv laughter from the Republican side and some expressions of surprise from the Democrats.

"'Thousands can't afford to lose the day,' said John Connelly. 'The great mass of visitors will find their time all too short as it is, without closing our doors on Sunday. I don't believe the opening of the exhibition will destroy the American Sabbath. People are getting broader views on such subjects. In New York the Sunday opening of the Art Museum was fought vigorously at first, but the press has educated the people up to it and we shall soon hav it open. I believe that if this great exhibition is opened on Sunday the morals and virtue of the world will be benefited instead of degraded by it.'

"'Let us leave the question to the Chicago managers,' again urged Leader Bush. 'It would be foolish for us to order the New York exhibit closed on Sunday and hav others kept open. No state should hamper its exhibit like that. It is unfair to the people to determin that question here. Let us make the appropriation and leave it to the commissioners.'

"Here General Husted again took the floor and helped the fight along. 'Of course, the World's Fair should hav been held in New York,' he remarked cheerfully. 'But the South and Northwest were too strong and beat this state by pooling their issues, just as they propose to beat you gentlemen of the majority in the national convention.'

"'Our convention,' shouted the Democratic chorus.

"'Yes, yours,' retorted General Husted. 'Now it is a fact that no great exhibition of any kind in this country was ever kept open on Sunday except in Chicago. This is one of the handsomest and most energetic cities we hav, but it is also the most godless city on this continent, outside of Leadville. I know it. Chicago is away ahead of even Paris in iniquity. And I will never vote for any measure which violates the American Sunday. I believe in that day as I believe in God and the savior, and my whole support goes to this amendment.'

"Colonel Webster said a few words after the Westchester orator had sat down and folded his hands, but so many of the Democratic members were absent that all the efforts to save the bill intact were useless and the anti-Sunday-opening amendment was carried by a vote of 49 to 47.

"Then everybody looked disgusted and the Republicans chuckled. But the fiery Democratic leader was on his feet at once. 'I move to table the bill,' he said, 'so as to let our Republican friends gather their scattered senses. They will soon see that it don't pay to try to make politics out of a quasi-religious question. It will be a good idea to wait till they can hear what the people think of their action.'

"Both Deyo and Husted objected vigorously to the plan, but the House adopted it by a vote of 51 to 49, and the fight will be reopened at an early day."

It is curious, and it may not be uninstructiv, to note that the Sunday-closing amendment was made an almost party affair—Republicans for, Democrats against. The former need laboring with, therefore, a little harder than the latter. Our advice last week, DO NOT DELAY, we repeat with still more urgency now.

Mr. Benjamin Harrison is in favor of a law for the District of Columbia which shall prevent any mechanic collecting wages for Sunday labor. Rev. R. C. Wylie, in the Christian Nation, states that the message of President Harrison about the Chilean difficulty, that was sent to Congress on Monday noon, was sent to the government printer's office on Sabbath noon, to be at once put in type. And the question arises, if the Sunday law had been enacted could the government printers hav collected their pay? What a Presbyterian hypocrit our president is, anyway!

According to the Rev. Dr. Mills, of Milwaukee, the American Secular Union is responsible for a good deal. In a recent sermon on Sunday observance he said: "There are many darts thrust at the Sabbath, and principal among them is the Secular Union. Eleven years ago that society was founded with the one idea of working for the opening of the Centennial exposition on Sunday. Failing in this purpose, the society effected a national organization, and by its influence literature railing against the Sabbath was circulated. These papers reached the Anarchistic societies of Europe and they, thinking that at last a land had been discovered where the commune and other license-, not liberty-loving bands could exist, hastened to the United States. When Robert Ingersoll aided in the organization of the Secular Union he invited Anarchy to America and brought to this fair land the Atheistic, Socialistic scum of Europe." We hav serious doubts that the "Socialistic scum" of Europe ever heard of the American Secular Union. But we do hope that the managers of the World's Fair at Chicago will hear of it. Mr. Mills is as badly mixed in the other statements as in this; but he is not worth setting right.

On the Pacific Coast.

News and Notes.

The Rev. Mr. Briggs, of Modesto, refused to accept my challenge to debate, at the advice, he said, of his Christian friends. It seems that Mr. Briggs is growing wiser—his bravery is oozing out, and "discretion is the better part of valor." He was quite anxious for debate when I reached Modesto awhile ago, but has concluded that he had better stick to the pulpit and only attack the Infidel when he is a hundred miles away.

In place of the debate I gave three lectures at Modesto February 8th, 9th, 10th, on "The Religious Conspiracy," etc. The audiences constantly increased. Evidently there is a very large Liberal element in Modesto. Colonel Kelso did a good work here in former years. He was a teacher at Modesto and vicinity, and in lonely toil, with the bare necessities of life, wrote his Freethought books, and contended with the orthodox clergymen whenever they were willing to meet him. He prepared the way for Liberal advance. I am sure, notwithstanding the array of seven or more churches, that the majority of the people of this place are Liberal, but it needs work to develop the latent forces.

I had a delightful sociable time at Modesto. The people giv good welcome to their homes. Mr. and Mrs. C. Lee, of the American House, do their best for the comfort of the Secular Pilgrim, and make one wish to stay longer in these fields of labor. I was pleased to meet with Mrs. Whitmore, Mrs. Williams, and others, from Ceres, a neighboring rural town, which sent quite a delegation to our meetings. I also enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Elliott; with Mr. and Mrs. Leigh Irvine; Mr. and Mrs. Allen, with Mrs. Rose their daughter, a stanch Liberal; Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, and Mr. and Mrs. B. Weil and family. With this circle of friends the sunny days at Modesto were charming indeed. The weather was never more delicious. Warm and bright were the skies, and the sun, despite the "spots" which I looked upon through a smoked glass, shone with cloudless glory. Mr. B. Weil, on Thursday, gave me a pleasurable trip about the city in his shining new rig called, I believe, the London Track, which made a most gay appearance in glittering harmony with the magnificent sunshine of the noon-day. Far off shone the snowy summits of the Sierras; to the westward were the blue and glorious walls of the Coast range; between were the vast plains, with orchards and vineyards, black plowed fields of thousands of acres, the green banks of the flowing river, and the pretty little city in the midst with its many elegant dwellings and rustle of business. I am obliged to my friend, Mr. Weil, for this picturesque drive; this vision of California's varied loveliness.

I count myself fortunate in making the acquaintance here of Leigh H. Irvine, the business manager of the Modesto News. He has written a brilliant book entitled, "The Struggle for Bread," which comes nearer, I think, to hitting the mark, than most of the books that treat of labor problems. Mr. Irvine does not undertake to do the impossible. He has no "patent remedies." He simply states the situation; givs facts and figures; offers valuable suggestions; he clears the way, and does not muddle his conclusions with impracticable theories. Everyone who is interested in the questions of the day will find this book a help. Mr. Irvine is a young man, and has a fine career before him, I think, for he has come of admirable Freethought stock. Those who read the articles of Clarke Irvine, or "Holt," in THE TRUTH SEEKER, will know whereof I speak, and realize that my young friend has a capable ancestry. While I was in Leigh Irvine's office a card came by mail from his father recommending, if ever he had the opportunity, to cultivate the acquaintance of Samuel Putnam, representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This was a pleasant coincidence, and I keep the card thus received in remembrance of "Holt."

I was also pleased to meet, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Lapham, Miss Valerie Hickethier, of Oakland, one of the bright newspaper women of California, who will undoubtedly make her mark both in literature and Freethought. Also I was pleased to strike hands with Hanscom, Sr., a pioneer of Liberalism in this country. His son, Mr. S. L. Hanscom, a fearless Freethinker, conducts the Modesto Herald. Captain James; W. J. Smith, an old comrade of Omaha when I was in the Unitarian pulpit; Judge Capron, and others it was my privilege again to meet. Modesto is not only a place of happy memory, but of hope for the future.

It was my good luck, as I left Modesto with its bright days, to meet, almost the first one on the train, Alonzo F. Jones, of the American Sentinel. I believe he is a "Rev.," but he doesn't seem to me a bit like a preacher. He has read my "Religious Experience," he says, with interest, but he does not accept my conclusions. Well, if one is to hav a religious faith, I think that of the Seventh Day Adventists is as good as any. I like their heaven much better than I do the orthodox heaven, and there is no hell about it either. Like the Mormon religion, it is a materialistic religion—and, so far, sensible. There is no natural immortality at all. It comes through Christ, by a supernatural power. Therefore the wicked perish—there is no eternal hell. As for the saints, they don't play on harps and loaf around the throne, but they inherit this good, solid earth, and they are good, solid men and women, with appetites, etc., and they liv with flesh and blood on the bosom of this regenerated world, where there are no grasshoppers or cyclones or scale bugs or gophers or fleas and such things; but there are green fields, shining waters, beautiful mountains, sunny skies, herds of cattle, flocks of sheep on a thousand hills, fish in the sea; there, in comfortable houses, on pleasant farms, the land flowing with milk and honey, liv the saints forever in undisturbed felicity. I really like that heaven. It is interesting, because it is human. I regard Mr. Jones as one of the brightest thinkers in the country, as well as a sturdy worker. He has just published a valuable work, "The Two Republics." It is one of the best studies of the Roman republic and empire, of Christianity, of Constantine, of our early history, of the Puritans, of the formation of our secular Constitution, that there is out. It shows the dangerous growth of ecclesiastical power in the legislation and judicial decisions of our country. Every Freethinker should read this book. It is one of the best political volumes of the day. Mr. Jones is absolutely in favor of liberty. On that question we are thoroughly at one. When his own church undertook to make a creed, he opposed and defeated the movement. His criticisms of Judge Hammond's decision are of great value. They not only show legal learning, but insight into universal principles. I would not hav missed my journey with Jones on any account. It was an intellectual treat, and I had a chance also to get posted on the situation, for by his untiring labors Mr. Jones keeps informed of the doings of the church power. The dangers are greater than I thought them to be. There is a long, hard struggle before us.

On Friday evening, February 12th, the San Francisco Liberals meet to devise means, if possible, to continue lectures and sociables during the year. In a place like San Francisco there are great difficulties in the way of permanent work. Our special effort during the month of January was very successful. I am glad to see that the new elements are coming in, and that the interest grows. There will be a sociable and entertainment on Sunday evening, February 21st.

Saturday night I attended the ninth anniversary of the Bohemian Golden Gate Lodge. I always look forward to this sociable gathering of the countrymen of Huss for a good time all night long. My friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. Vostrovsky, with all the children, come up yearly from San José to attend this festival. Mr. Vostrovsky is prominent both as a speaker and writer among his countrymen, and by various contributions to journals in his own language helps on the Freethought movement. Bohemia is one of the most interesting countries in all Europe. It is the land of song and romance, and it is no wonder that in America the ancestral domain is remembered, and the old songs are sung, and the old music thrills.

We all go there—Captain Johnson, Mrs. Andrews, of "Around the World Alone;" Lilian and Stephen Pearl, Mr. and Mrs. Emil Lemme, and others; and it is a merry and beautiful sight. The hall is crowded, the flag floats above, and gay and animating strains fill the air. The opening of the grand march is by the president of the society, Mr. T. Matejovic. Dr. J. Prosek, Mr. Jos. L. Baloun, and comrades more, we greet again under the shining banners of Bohemia and Columbia. The dance flows on, the Lancers and the waltz, the polka and the Spanish; but especially fascinating is the Beseda, the Bohemian national dance. The music is lovely, martial, and joyous, with low, sweet melodies and trumpet tones, and over the vast hall hundreds join in the brilliant maze. Bright and intricate and picturesque are the changing figures. The glancing forms, harmoniously moving, make a scene of glittering enchantment.

Of course we did not go home till morning on such an occasion as this, which only comes once a year. It was 6 o'clock in the morning—Sunday—when my San José friends and myself drank a parting cup of coffee, waiting for the train, and then with Stephen Pearl Andrews—familiar name—I lingered until the horse-cars ran and at 8 o'clock A.M. was on my way to Sacramento to lecture that evening. After a good nap in the hospitable mansion of Mr. Goodhill, the first one to greet me, to my surprise, was John A. Jost, of Ogden. I had not seen him for years. He is now eighty-two and as ready for work as ever, still looking ahead.

I had the usual audience at Sacramento, neither very large nor very small, but attentiv. I discoursed on Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Infidelity. So long as there is R. Butterfield, N. D. Goodell, and others to stand by the flag I shall make Sacramento a battle-field, no matter what its changing fortunes.

Mr. J. Vostrovsky handed me the San José papers, in which there is a great hubbub about the Bible in the normal schools. It was excluded six months ago by the board of trustees. Thereupon a petition was circulated for its reinstatement. This was signed by five hundred of the pupils, the county and city superintendents, and nearly all the teachers in the county. After a warm session the matter was laid upon the table. The Bible is still excluded. There is great excitement, and the pulpits thunder with arguments. Some of them are upon our side. Father Calzia of the Catholic church puts the matter so tersely, that I will place his words on record. They are valuable for reference:

> Yesterday at the last mass Father Calzia delivered a short but most emphatic sermon on the Bible question.
> The object of his remarks was to show that the petition lately presented to the board of the normal school trustees is most unreasonable, unjust, and utterly in opposition with the broad American spirit of our public institutions.
> "Thank God," said he, "there are among the normal school trustees men wise enough to know what is right, just and reasonable, and brave enough to stand by it. We owe it to them that the petition was postponed indefinitly, and, indeed," said Father Calzia, "it takes very little intelligence to understand that the normal school, being a public institution, namely, an institution erected for the benefit of all alike, Jews, Infidels, Protestants, and Catholics, is and must be unsectarian, and consequently must be entirely free from all sectarian practices of worship.
> "Now everybody knows that the reading of the Protestant Bible is exclusivly Protestant religious worship, and one of the most essential among them. To introduce, therefore, the reading of the Bible into our normal school is nothing less than to make it not an American but a Protestant institution. And with great reason will all non-Protestant citizens of the United States take offense at such an action.

Rev. J. H. Garnett, Baptist, also talks good sense. He says:

> The Bible is read in the public schools either for its religious character or for its moral or literary beauty. If the latter, others, Catholics, Infidels, or Atheists, may demand that their favorit books be read. If the former, we ask, by what authority do we seek to introduce our religion in state schools? How would we like to hav the reading of the scriptures alternate with a deliverance from the pope or from Ingersoll?
> Any man who is not in a ditch of prejudice so deep that he cannot see his way out must see that it will not do for Christian sects to touch the public school curriculum. The genius of our government and the heterogeneousness of our people forbid this.

These are signs of progress in the pulpit.

A Farewell Reception.

From the Stockton, Cal., Independent.

About fifty guests gathered at the residence of F. A. Ruhl Sunday evening after S. P. Putnam's lecture, and gave Mr. Putnam a farewell reception. He left for the East at noon yesterday to be absent several months, and the gathering last evening was to giv him a farewell that would emphasize the pleasant nature of his visits to Stockton. A bountiful and highly relishable banquet was spread, after which there was a general and pleasant exchange of views by the gentlemen present.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE.

II.

The moral nature is in danger the moment "revelation" is made a part of mental equipment.

"But," they say, "You must admit that most Christians are fairly good people." Certainly; so are most "pagans," most of the followers of Buddha, of Confucius, or of Mohammed. Captain Adams, author of "Travels in Faith," formerly captain of the Golden Fleece, says: "I saw less wickedness in the heathen shores of China, India, and Java and Sumatra than in the Christian wharves of New York and Boston or about the docks of London and Liverpool."

It may astonish those who employ the average Roman Catholic servants to be told that in five years of experience with those gentle and faithful heathen from Japan I have never been compelled to turn a key upon either food, jewels, or money. What we, in our arrogance, call Christian morality is doubly discounted by these Buddhists, Confucians, ancestor-worshipers, and Shintos to whom we have the ineffable impudence to send missionaries! And in this connection I may illustrate how well the oriental mind takes in our plan of salvation. An intelligent Shinto boy of twenty asked me what the word devil meant. He found it in his English reader. He was smiling in a queer way. I said: "Did you never hear of the devil, Richi? Is there no devil in Japan?" He bowed and smiled incredulously and replied, "O, I hear 'bout one missionaries brought, but you don't believe that?" "No," said I, "I don't. But what kind of a devil was this that the missionaries took to Japan?" I wanted to get his idea. "He is the Christian's bad God," said he, which is the best definition I ever heard. But Richi was laughing as he left the room. He thought it silly.

Morals are universal and progressive. Revealed religions are local and claim to be final. That is just why they are harmful.

All men know that it is "wrong" to steal. Why? Simply because every man objects to being stolen from. He doesn't need a God to tell him that his coat does not belong to Sam Jones. It would simply be a waste of time and breath for a God to mention it to him. Gods don't need to tell us anything that we can otherwise find out.

But, they say, "I don't steal or murder because God says it is not right."

I heard a gentleman, a prominent lawyer in New York, say only the other day that the reason he did not steal $500 from a sleeping guest was because of his fear of hell. He was a Catholic. I think that he slandered himself. I suspect that it is because of a much more creditable reason to himself than that. If it is not then I can tell you just what is the real reason. Fear of the law. Fear of being found out.

The poor barbarian says he does not steal because it rains if he does. The thunder peals and the lightnings flash and the gods are angry. But suppose the anger were not expressed to him by lightning and thunder, then he would let the gods be just as angry as they pleased. His fear would be stilled. It is fear of results right here that deters him. Physical results if he is ignorant or brutal, mental results if he is intelligent and good.

Men are beginning to understand the vast import of this fact; but it will bear but scant and withered fruit until women believe it and teach it to their children. Until this is done the top may be nipped off from time to time, but the root will poison the spring of life still.

So long as women look with reverence and awe upon the silly customs of the church, so long will they be sustained. So long as the cradle is littered with Sunday-school leaflets, wherein witches dance and dead men talk, fear will grip the human mind like a vice and ghosts will be as thick as huckleberries. One of the funny things about those Sunday-school lesson leaflets is that although they all arrange to have the children carefully taught the same old romance on the same day, no denomination will trust any other to tell a straight story.

If Daniel and the lions (with the capricious appetite) happen to be the subject for to-day's lesson, the Methodists send their flocks roaring lions. The Presbyterian children get predestination lions and the Baptist infants get immersion lions—sea-lions as it were. But once let mothers see how trivial it all is, make woman smile with contempt upon the pompous idiocy, and the battle is won.

A short time ago when a great flourish of trumpets was made over the stupendous fact that the pope had decided to confer the berretta and cassock and cap upon an old gentleman in this country and call him a "cardinal" and a "prince," I heard a lawyer make some quite excited remarks about it. He said that it ought to be prevented by law in this country. That it savored of monarchy. And you know it is like shaking a red rag at a male bovine to say monarchy to one of our statesmen. But I don't see how you could make a law to prevent one old gentleman from making a great parade over giving another old gentleman a shoulder-cape and skull-cap more or less embroidered, and calling him a prince or a dodo or anything else.

Seems to me we have got to meet that sort of thing in another way. It is time to stop treating any of it seriously. We might as well legislate against paper dolls for small children.

If the large majority of women and a good sprinkling of men are still in the paper doll stage of development, the remedy is not in legislation. It is in education.

But so long as anyone continues in a mental condition where reverence for such nonsense is possible serious argument is a waste of valuable time. Nothing can be gained by arguing with a vacuum.

And for that very reason the education of women in the sciences is vastly more important to-day than the education of men.

The church understands this perfectly and that is the reason it always has frowned upon and always will oppose solid, scientific, practical education for women.

There is no danger that a boy will be afraid of his shadow if his mother does not believe in ghosts! And I repeat that orthodoxy, with a zeal worthy of a better cause, has always opposed higher and solid education for women. It was a case of self-preservation. And it is time for woman to understand that it is not to her religion but to the manliness and intellectual development of men that women must look for help.

Just so far as the lower nature of man is overcome, just so far as the dogmas and usages of past ages lose their control, just so far as "divine authority" is left out and the reason and human manliness of men comes to the front, just that far are women always the gainers.

All of the religions of the past were built to fit the mental and moral status of the time in which they originated. They are in no way fitted to present social conditions.

In the main, social evolutions have been so gradual that, with little outward friction, dogmas have been refitted, lopped off, added on or quietly dropped, so as to attract but small attention.

But in a few notable cases where violence has been necessary and direct conflict inevitable men have never hesitated to employ harsh measures against the very religion which they, all the while, claimed was divine, unalterable, perfect. Did you ever think of that? The theories of the divine right of kings, and the institution of slavery as dealt with in the United States, are two most notable cases of this kind.

Now, it so happens that in the natural course of social evolution what is called the "woman question" has come to the top of the wheel. Her higher education and her general status before the law. In point of fact there is no such question unless woman is considered as not a part of the human race. If she is a human being then when the question of right is once settled for man it is settled for her also. Right is not masculine only, and justice knows no sex. It is only because she was looked upon by barbarians and then by the church as something less than human that a question was ever admitted on this point. And the recent letter of the House of Bishops of the Episcopal church reiterates and emphasizes this ancient, barbarous, infamous theory.

But take the so oft repeated maxim of our government, for example, "The right of government rests upon the consent of the governed." Can any brain capable of even a modicum of thought apply that to man and not to woman? If so, in the name of common sense how and why?

So it is again with the question of education. Not long ago it was believed to be unsafe and unnecessary to educate what was called the "common people." To-day that is modified and woman, alone, is proscribed, and with less logic. Now, in all these past conflicts of opinion, in all these battles of progress, no one ever thought of saying that the reformers were "men-haters," nor that it was a war against men, yet they were conditions which men had established. There was a principle at stake and the conflicts were upon that basis. But in the present struggle toward a firmer human footing for women, one often hears it said, and reads in the papers, that Miss or Mrs. So-and-So is a "man-hater" simply because she advocates absolute sex equality.

This is a very absurd idea, and in nine cases out of ten it is wholly incorrect as to fact. As a rule we like men immensely. We like them so well that we want to see them do justice to their own higher natures and not be blinded by superstition and priestcraft in their opinions of and conduct toward one-half of the human race. At the present time they are simply sex maniacs. We don't want to see them let the dogmas which sit so lightly upon their shoulders for themselves rule and blind them in their actions toward us. It is a mistaken idea that man gains in dignity or in power by keeping woman inferior or by shutting her out from the higher education, competition, and emoluments of this world. He does just the reverse. Why? Simply because one-half of the human race cannot progress rapidly, normally, nor well by itself. Harvard and Yale, not to mention Columbia, may continue to put a protection tariff on the brains of young men: but so long as they must get those brains from the proscribed sex, just so long will male brains remain an "infant industry" and continue to need protection. Stupid mothers never did, and stupid mothers never will, furnish this world with brilliant sons.

That this world has not been peopled by a weaker-minded race than it has is due to the blessed fact that some women had brains, and although forbidden to use them the command was not so fully obeyed as St. Paul (and most of his followers) desired. But just so long as the pulpit teaches supernaturalism to pews that are filled with mothers, just that long will the cradle be shadowed by ghosts and the affairs of this world will be pushed aside or endured in all their injustice by dupes of priest and prince who teach that another life will remedy all the ill of this.

Now, don't understand me that I blame men for all this any more than I blame them for being afraid of ghosts, or for thinking with Christ that fits were "devils"—any more than I blame the Egyptians for worshiping the Nile or the Kaffirs for baiting with their own children their traps to catch lions. It is simply the stage of development—of evolution—to which they have thus far attained. It is their present size. This is my point.

They are like the old man in Arkansas. It was during the war. Quinine was so scarce in the South that people would do almost anything to get it. A slim, wiry, sallow old woman came into the commander's tent one day and asked for the doctor. He responded. She told him that she must have quinine. "My ole man is boun' t' die," said she, "if you can't give him some. He's powerful bad off."

The army was no better off in the matter of quinine than she was, so the doctor sent her back without. "But," said he, "if you will take about an ounce of sage and put one quart of boiling water on it, and when it cools a little have him drink it, I think it will help him."

The poor old soul went home and put an ounce of sage in a cup, poured a quart of boiling water on, and then lifted the old man up and told him to drink it. He drank about half and then nature rebelled and he could drink no more. A second time she took a fresh ounce of sage and another quart of water and the old man tried hard to take it, but when about half gone his stomach revolted and she laid him down, defeated in her attempt to carry out literally what she understood as the doctor's directions. And yet a third time—as the scriptures would put it—she measured out the sage and the water, and the old man stopped half-way.

She trudged back to camp and came weeping to the doctor.

"Doctor," said she, "if you can't think o' something else, my ole man's boun' to die."

"My dear madam," said the doctor, "did you try it just as I told you?"

"Yes, doctor, I tried it three times, an' my ole man he don't hold but a pint!" she said, and sobbed aloud.

And most men don't hold but a pint, mentally speaking. Why demand that they take the whole quart at one time? But what I contend for is that those of us who do hold more may be permitted to use the extra capacity, and also, I insist that it is an outrage to fill the pint of the simple with that which is neither a food nor a medicine, but is simply a mental narcotic.

It is more than anything else to-day due to man's superstition and the shadow of his childhood belief in a fixed and now happily outgrown religion, which holds him to his particular prejudices on what he is pleased to call the woman question. So long as that is in him there is no room for a broad conception of justice, a lofty ideal of freedom, which shall give to all others—including women—that which he demands for himself. And it is almost wholly due to woman's religious training that she so tamely accepts the "crumbs from the master's table." So long as people of either sex hold but a pint, and that pint is filled with orthodox superstitions, you cannot crowd into their brains the newer, loftier thoughts of scientific sociology and evolution.

Most Infidels, Agnostics, or Freethinkers are just to woman—in theory—and the more firm a foundation a man has for his unbelief in dogmas the more likely is he to be just to her. For his mind is clearer and freer. It is possible for him to be logical and fair. His brain is not hampered and dwarfed to fit a creed. His natural manliness is not walled in by prejudice and superstition, and he is better able to "do unto others as he would that others should do unto him."

And how does this so-called Christian doctrine strike you if women were to reverse the present order of things? Which no one would deplore more than I.

Indeed, I was much surprised a few days ago when a gentleman said to me, "Mrs. Gardener, don't you think you are a trifle hard on men?" Well, now, I must confess I did not think so. Upon the contrary, I thought I was quite inclined the other way. I rather like men.

But that fact does not prevent me from having a difference of opinion from certain orthodox gentlemen like the Rev. Dr. Dix and Brother Talmage, who admire the family relations of Solomon and applaud the ethics of St. Paul. Now, I think that Solomon was so much married that he never was married at all, and that St. Paul's head was so big just over the bumps of self-esteem and proneness to give advice that his bump of appreciativeness of woman was simply concave. At the same time I only do Paul justice when I say that his inclination to take up a new idea was such that I have no doubt that had he lived up to within a few years ago he would have been a leader in the co-educational and woman suffrage movements, and most likely president of an association of Agnostics. I think I can see Colonel Ingersoll resign in Paul's favor and in his graceful way remark to the doughty Apostle, "Age before beauty." And it would not be unlike Paul to accept, with the remark that beauty was "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen"—and take the chair, with all that pertained thereto. And instead of recommending Sisters Phœbe and Priscilla to the Romans Paul would be writing letters of commendation for Elizabeth Cady Stanton to present to the suffrage committee at Washington, or for Helen to carry to a convention of Freethinkers. That was Paul's way. And it was not at all a bad way—in his time. He thought he knew a good thing when he saw it—and he was not afraid to espouse a cause because it was new or not fashionable.

Well, there are some people that way yet, and if they get their toes trod upon it is no more than the doughty Apostle had to endure before them.

It is the tribute Progress always pays to Stagnation. The price Stupidity exacts from Superiority.

And, after all, it is not much to pay, and it furnishes the whole helpless lot of mediocres with something to do—something to think—something to say. If it were not for that the poor souls would have nothing more exciting than four prayer-meetings a week, or the hang of the pastor's gown, for mental stimulus. Think of it!

So, for variety as well as for veracity's sake, I hope that henceforth those who hear us, or read what we say, upon this subject, will not think nor say that women who take part in the struggle for religious freedom, or in the movement for social or legal advancement of the race, are "men haters," are "soured," or "cross," or "embittered against men."

If, occasionally, some woman grows impatient and snaps out something sharp and cutting, it is no more than men do in all of their contests with each other. I have even heard it whispered that it is sometimes done by opposing political parties—that sometimes Democrats or Republicans say little spiteful things about the opposite party. Now, we should be measured by the same rule, only with the added charity which goes with the fact that women are wholly untrained, as yet, for this sort of discussion.

So let us hereafter stand fair and square upon that basis Let us keep the ground clear of rubbish and personalities, so that we can see clearly the principles at stake, whether they be for man or for woman.

The Bible and orthodox Christianity have in the past been criticised and condemned by thinkers from various outlooks, and for a great variety of reasons. Voltaire and his school objected to them from many different points of view; but, in the main, they were concerned with the bad effects produced by the influence of superstition and the Church upon the State. With its political intrigues and its general effect upon political life. Others, again, protest because of the inevitable cruelties and brutalities which always have been, and which always must be, the chief support under dogmatic beliefs. Natural scientists have offered their objection from the outlook and standpoint of their especial field which enables them to see so plainly the paralytic influence "revelations" always exercise over scientific investigation, and hence over material, commercial, and intellectual progress. Another set of thinkers fought Christianity not many years ago, distinctly and solely upon the ground that it upheld slavery—the ownership and sale of human beings. Still others object because of the impossible demand that all people, all classes of minds, believe the same things. Because of the threats held over the head of honest Doubt—doubt of myth and miracle. Later still has arisen a party which fight it on the ground that it teaches that "the poor you have always with you" is not only a fact, but that it is right that it should be so. With all of these I have the profoundest sympathy, and am in the most hearty accord.

But there is one corner of the field which I have taken as my particular skirmishing-ground, and, while it is and can be in no way separated from any or all of the other acres tilled so well by my powerful predecessors, and by my able contemporaries—to whom I most respectfully take off my hat—still my little field has its special features and its urgent needs, which have, I think, been less considered, and much less understood, than any other in all the vast domain. This is the little plot devoted to dower. The corner belonging to women as women.

There are those who suggest to me that I might well claim half of all the whole field upon this basis: but I want to be quite within the limits set by the most vehement advocate of masculine pervasiveness and dominion and still show that I have a case. And I, myself, agree that no blow has ever been struck for liberty, no tree felled, no furrow run, which may have been intended for man only which has not—in a degree—been for women also. Therefore, I do not hold that half of the field is yet untilled, but simply that our little "homestead" lot is still a howling wilderness. And so long as the thistles of superstition and ignorance are left growing thick and rank on it, there will always be enough seed blown over the whole field to make man's life a burden and his progress and happiness both slow and insecure.

In other words, the theory held to-day by so many men—that it is not necessary for woman to think—that it does no real harm for her to accept, ready-made, his cast-off theological and scientific opinions, is as great a blunder as it is possible for him to make.

It is more important for this world, and for future progress, it is more important for the Freethought cause and for the industrial cause, that women be well and thoroughly trained in all new and advancing ideas than that men be so trained.

Why? Because no man can give his children an intellectual cripple for a mother without giving his wife intellectual dwarfs for children. We must remember that.

The Cradle of yesterday is the Pew of to-day, and will be the Pulpit of the future. Therefore every new generation will have the same old fight, the same tiresome and hopeless struggle with ignorance and fear, until the children are started in life with clear brains and are cradled by mothers without superstition.

So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the Cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a Devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him.

The Prize Essay.

Some weeks ago a good friend sent me a prize essay and asked me to giv my opinion of it as a manual for the use of schools. I read it immediately, but hav been rather tardy in "saying my say" about it. One reason for my tardiness is that I had hoped to obtain a copy of an old book, out of which I learned some of my first lessons in education. The book was "Webster's Spelling-Book," but it seems entirely out of print, and I hav not been able as yet with all my inquiries to find one. There were several fables in the book, equaling Esop's, in a moral point of view, and the pictures which illustrated them were about as artistic as some of Heston's. In the back part of the book there were several pages devoted to a "Moral Catechism," which, as I remember it, would be worth as much as the "prize essay." To be sure, seventy years is a long time to hold in memory a dissertation upon morals, learned when my years were so few that I had no idea of the meaning of the many large words used. Whether the author of the spelling-book was the author of the catechism I do not know, but that teachers paid any attention to it or required a pupil to commit it to memory I cannot recall. I know that the clergyman who was the director of the school required the reading or recitation of the Westminster catechism once a week, but the moral catechism was wholly ignored. Now, I had hoped to compare this work with the one seventy-five years later, and by that means discover how far we had advanced in moral education. Had we had the book at the time it was promised at the meeting of the Secular Union in Portsmouth, or the following Christmas, as we were assured we should hav, I for one was ready to approve it, even though it might be defectiv in some respects; and then, as a production of the Freethinkers united in a union, I was already enjoying presenting it to persons who are continually saying, "The Freethinkers never do anything," as something done. Alas for hopes blighted!

The book did not make its appearance until we had exhausted our interest. It was not presented to the congress as anything done by the society, and no mention was made of the innumerable essays written by a great number of persons who had hoped to gain the prize, which, according to the promises of the late president of the Secular Union, would be published.

The book is not what I expected; but if there had been no $1,000 prize offered for it, but its publishers had offered it to the general public on its own merits, not pretending that the Freethinkers had anything to do with it, as it seems they had not, save only to supply the money, the book would hav been accepted as a gain to Liberals. As it is, we shall some of us feel that was one of the promises all unfulfilled with which our late officers flattered us. I hope we shall bear our defeat without despair, and that the new officers will hav learned by past experience not to promis much, especially if they shall ignore all suggestions made by persons who hav always faced the brunt without complaint. To tell a society that we, the president and secretary, shall do as we please, without regard to directors, and then fill the communications with agonizing petitions for money, would be laughable only that its imbecility is painful.

Will you permit me, Mr. Editor, just at the close of my communication to congratulate you upon the improvement of THE TRUTH SEEKER—I mean its outward appearance. Surely, whatever we may say of the Secular Union, THE TRUTH SEEKER is a success. I wish its subscribers may increase this year a hundredfold. LUCY N. COLMAN.

W. S. Bell on His Way to California.

I should hav said in my last letter that although my lectures at San Antonio were rather slimly attended, Mr. John H. Copeland made them a financial success. This is not the way our lecture affairs usually turn out. Most frequently it is a great cry and little wool. Dr. P. P. Lounsbery, proprietor of the St. Leonard Hotel, gave me most hospitable entertainment while I was in the city.

A long ride brought me to El Paso, and the most remarkable thing I hav seen since I arrived was the bull-fight just over the border in Mexico. Everyone that comes to El Paso goes to see a bull-fight if he has never seen one before. Usually one entertainment is enough. To me it was more of a farce than a tragedy. The bulls were small and poor, and had not much fight in them. Occasionally one would take after his tormentors as if he wished him to take either horn of the dilemma, but the great effort they made to get out of harm's way, with the picture of ghastly fright all over their faces, made me laugh at the scene. One picador had his horse knocked down by a bull, who ran over both horse and rider, but neither man nor horse was hurt. But the next time the bull made a charge upon the horse, he gored him in the breast and a stream of blood poured out upon the sand. The horse was taken out of the ring before he fell dead. The matter of killing a fighting bull did not seem an easy thing to do. I was surprised at the large audience present, and that so many of them should be women and children. I must not omit to state that while the bull-fight is going on hundreds of throats are open and shouting themselvs hoarse in deriding the poor performance. But the fighters are too intent upon the bull to care much for the uncomplimentary epithets showered upon them. And the strangest thing in all this business is that the Mexican never gets tired of seeing bull-fights.

I made the acquaintance of a few Liberals here, and only a few—Mr. S. C. Schutz, D. R. Miller and family, Dr. Dengler, and a few others.

My audiences were good and quite enthusiastic, but I was not able to impress upon them the untold treasures of wisdom that illuminate the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the pages of Bell's "Handbook." Now is the time when Freethinkers should subscribe for the Liberal papers.

I shall soon be in California. W. S. BELL.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: On account of moving to my new bishopric, and other things, I hav been unable to write earlier, although I hav made many frantic efforts to dispatch a letter to New York. However, all's well that ends well; and I trust there will be no further serious breaks in the sequence of letters.

Why, goodness only knows, but there seems to be an unaccountable lethargy coming over our party, ripe as the time undoubtedly is for being wide awake and full of energy. I do not regard this for a single moment as a decay of Secularism, because our principles are being pushed forward right and left by those who are nominally opposed to us. Only last night I was advised to go up to the Vegetarian restaurant in Franklin street and hear a discussion upon "New Testament Teachings." Lo and behold! Christ and his teachings were condemned in a way in which even I was not prepared to follow. The speakers were principally Spiritualists, and in their eagerness to disdain any connection with orthodox Christianity they seemed to overstep the boundaries of common sense altogether, and to condemn as all but worthless rubbish the teachings of the New Testament. When the discussion time arrived I ventured to criticise some of the things said from our Secularist standpoint, and certainly scored with the majority of the audience when I stated that we Secularists are willing to take all that is good from the Bible without attributing to it any supernatural origin or regarding it from a religious standpoint. The result was an invitation to lecture there upon Secularism. Thus a new field of operation has been opened up, and if our Secularist friends were more alive to the exigencies of the times, they would hunt up all these advocates of side issues, try and take part in their debates, and pave the way for a more ample explanation of Freethought doctrins, and the carrying on of our war into the enemy's camp.

This week, Celestine Edwards, a very popular negro preacher and eloquent withal, is to hold a week of Christian evidence lectures in Manchester, and I shall go and oppose him on some of the evenings. It will be a good advertisement for the branch as well as an eye-opener to the local Christians. Quite recently Mr. Edwards has been starring at Sheffield, where he has had it all his own way. The Sheffield Freethinkers are a very prosaic set of folks, and only a small section of those belong to the National Secular Society. Perhaps the Sheffielders did not think it was worth their while to reply to the humorist lecturer; if so, they ought to see their folly now. So keen was the pleasure derived from his lectures that the parsons hav caught the fever and are supplementing what the negro did. Well, Mr. Edwards's "Christian evidences" means in plain English insults to our party and principles, and I hav decided to accept the challenge to oppose him, which he has placarded liberally over Manchester.

The recent annual supper of the National Secular Society branches which form the London Secular Federation, was a great success. Mr. Foote, ever jovial and ever in earnest, was in the place of honor, and he was ably supported by Charles Watts, A. B. Moss, George Standring, R. O. Smith, J. M. Wheeler, and others of the party. Quite a bevy of beautiful ladies graced the festival, and one might easily hav imagined oneself among some orthodox Christians, so select was the company. Mr. Foote was cheered to the echo, as he well deserves to be. Poor Bradlaugh's loss was undoubtedly great, but I incline to think that of late years it was greater to the political parties in the country than to the Atheistic party as such. For some years he had become more and more exclusivly political in aim, although he gave us his occasional benediction and remained true to the principles of the National Secular Society. That was well, perhaps, for there was none other to take his place in that parliamentary strife which was so necessary to complete the edifice he was erecting by means of the National Secular Society. On the other hand he had brought out men who were able to replace him in the purely anti-theological branch of the work; and no one who looks fairly at the work which Mr. Foote has done since Mr. Bradlaugh's death, at the increased numbers of branches and members, the spreading influence of the society, and the greater acquaintance of leading Christians with our publications, can help but say that our present president, by throwing his whole heart and soul into the anti-theological struggle, has amply and nobly redeemed the promis he made to do all he could for us, and that he has fully vindicated Mr. Bradlaugh's choice of him as his successor in the now honorable post of the National Secular Society's president. While he is true to us we shall all be true to him.

I had put by a number of interesting ecclesiastical notes; but space forbids. What I can say, however, shall be said. First, the extraordinary boldness of the so called "higher criticism" or annihilation of the Bible has been met with a pious-sounding declaration by thirty-eight notable divines of various shades of opinion. Now these thirty-eight discover they hav made a mess of it. Some good Protestant churchmen who hav signed the declaration hav seen how they hav been hoodwinked into signing that very authority of the church to decree matters of faith against which they hav been all along protesting when the same claims emanated from Rome; and so the good bodies hav knocked the value out of the declaration by saying that they signed it for policy's sake whilst wishing that it had been otherwise worded. Now the world wants to know what the signatories do mean. Maybe I shall return to this in my next if the new developments call for detailed criticism. SAM STANDRING.

Anthony Comstock.

Mr. Anthony Comstock has had the honor of speaking to an audience at Cornell University. A series of discourses of a quasi-religious character hav been given in Barnes's Hall on the Campus for several successiv Sunday evenings past; and it was to fill one of these evenings (last Sunday) that Mr. Comstock appeared.

He commenced by saying that he had not come to pose as an orator; that he had not in his youth enjoyed such advantages as the young men before him were having to fit themselvs for public speaking—an announcement which was shown to be quite unnecessary during the first fifteen minutes of the hour-and-a-half speech which followed.

The address was announced to be on "Personal Purity," but turned out to be a tedious rehash of common, well-worn ideas about the evils of intemperance, gambling, betting on horse-racing, and vitiating literature, all of which he thought legislation ought to deal with. He was particularly anxious that a bill, now before the legislature, providing severe penalties for those who procure evidence by decoy methods, such as Mr. Comstock has had the credit of frequently using, should not become a law. He quite likely foresees that under its operation Othello's occupation would be gone, or at least seriously interfered with. The talk had no lack of religious cant and abounded in scripture quotations. Indeed, one might suppose that Mr. Comstock belongs to that class of religionists to whom Paul spoke on Mars Hill. His belief in a personal devil was made prominent and seemed to be unwavering.

The last half hour of his talk was devoted to the famous struggle before Congress for the repeal of the "Comstock Postal Laws." He said the Freethinkers and Infidels of the country had, on that occasion, sent to Congress a petition for the repeal of those laws, containing seventy thousand names, and that he appeared before the Congressional committee single-handed and alone, and by the grace and help of God put to rout the whole motley crowd of long-haired men and short-haired women who appeared there in favor of the petitions. His remarks and manner under this head called to mind one of Frank Carpenter's paintings, in which Falstaff is showing Prince Hal his hacked sword in proof of his terrible engagement with the men in buckram the night previous.

All this was of course rather entertaining to those who know Mr. Comstock and his ways and methods. But he further said that heading that petition of seventy thousand was the name of a well-known colonel, a notorious Infidel, whose name he did not deem it becoming to speak before an audience of religious people; and just here is where Mr. Comstock showed the cloven foot; for it cannot be doubted that Comstock knows that, so far from favoring that petition, Colonel Ingersoll severed his connection with the Liberal League, of which he was a member, solely because of the passage by that body of a resolution favoring the repeal of the Comstock laws. And yet Mr. Comstock's exceeding religiousness had not moral quality enough in it to restrain him in the face of that knowledge from attempting to place Colonel Ingersoll in a false position before a large and intelligent audience of Cornell professors and students. I say, attempting to do this mean thing, because the attempt was but partially successful, on account of the knowledge of its untruthfulness possessed by many of Mr. Comstock's audience

It is well, and on the whole a matter for congratulation, that Mr. Comstock has appeared in one University town, and before a Cornell audience; for it has given our people an opportunity to size the man up as to caliber and ruling animus. And, if I mistake not, the general verdict, after having seen and heard him, is that Mr. Comstock is a man altogether too narrow, intolerant, and bigoted to be intrusted with a position of very great power or responsibility; and that the Anti-Vice Society of New York would do a very safe and advantageous act to itself and the community at large were it to giv Mr. Comstock a very, very long leave of absence, and put a man of better judgment, better disposition, and better abilities generally in his place. Our Monday's daily gave this brief and rather significant notice of the lecture:

> Anthony Comstock, the well-known missionary against vicious literature, addressed a crowded auditorium in Barnes's Hall last evening. He was announced to speak upon "Personal Purity," and proceeded to talk about the three vices of intemperance, gambling, and indulgence in vitiating literature, which he said were the great agencies for corrupting the morals of the people.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

In a recent number of Las Dominicales, Demofilo, the well-known Spanish Freethinker, has a lengthy but very interesting article called, "A Catechism for Freethinkers," in which he sets forth in a series of questions and answers the fundamental principles of our belief, as based upon deductions from the sciences.

During the first eleven months of the year 1891 452 persons joined the French Freethought Federation and each one of these handed in in advance five francs for subscription on Bulletin Mensuelle, the Federation organ. And we notice likewise that neither French nor Belgian Freethought papers hav to remind their subscribers of the fact that it costs money to run a paper.

We are to hav a revision of the Revised Version of the Bible. Prof. Paul Haupt, of John Hopkins University, has gone to England to secure assistance. This new Bible will contain, in addition to the contents of the present one, all of the Apocryphal gospels, the pseudo-epigrams, new matter of Esdras, and all of Solomon's psalms, besides an extensiv commentary. The Old Testament alone will make two volumes of one thousand pages each.

That second-hand coat of Jesus which was exhibited in Trier last year is causing trouble yet. In Pirmasons, Germany, a woman had washed her child's woolen wrapper, and to get it quickly dry she ran a stick through the arms of the wrapper and hung it up to dry on the veranda. It was a Sunday, and she went out to get some fresh air. In the same street is a Roman Catholic church, and when the worshipers went to mass they were horrified. A warrant was sworn out and the woman on returning home was arrested for insulting the Catholic church and making fun of the pretended Christ's pretended coat. The matter, however, was explained to the judge and the pious complainants went home, sadder but wiser.

Some time ago we informed our readers that Freethought was making inroads among the students of Upsala University, Sweden. It has now become so prominent that a grand debate has taken place at the University. The Christian side was taken by four professors in theology, a prominent minister, a dozen academy principals, and theological students in abundance. Freethought was represented by Drs. Anton Nyström and Knut Wicksell, editors Hjalmar Branting and Victor Lennstrand, lecturer Charlier, and candidate Starböck. The only newspaper that dared to giv a tolerably full and accurate account of the debate was the Upsala Nya Tidning, several editions of which were sold during the week following. It is to the student society Verdandi of Upsala University that the honor is due of causing the debate by teaching and promulgating truth in said University, as well as through the country by its popular scientific essays which are read in every village in Sweden.

The last number of Fritänkaren contains the por, trait and biography of the Swedish Freethinker Hjalmar Strömer. It is interesting to notice that most of the prominent Swedish Freethinkers during their youth had a good touch of Christianity. Victor Lennstrand wanted to be a missionary, and Hjalmar Strömer to be a minister; Leufstedt is an ex-reverend, like our Putnam and Reynolds; Anton Nyström and Knut Wicksell were very pious. Mr. Strömer was born in Jämteland in 1849, and at the death of his mother found himself the happy possessor of $6. He was then eighteen years old. He studied first in the college of Hernösand, then entered Upsala University, where he tortured his brain with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and by the permission of the archbishop delivered as lay reader about two hundred sermons. Meanwhile Prof. Hj. Holmgren, the great mathematician, who thought it a shame that a man like Hj. Strömer should become a useless member of society, took him under his wing, and taught him the superiority of the exact sciences to theology, and the result was that Strömer thenceforward studied mathematics and astronomy at Upsala. He has since been lecturer at the Workingmen's Institute in Stockholm; has edited a paper, and taught Freethought in his public lectures. The clergy tried to make him stop, but in vain; and then, as usual, Christian love showed itself; he was slandered, persecuted. His audiences became smaller and smaller. Publishers refused to undertake the publication of his works. He had to sell his valuable library to get means to liv. At last, when he had become but a shadow of his former self, editor F. T. Barg saw him, and Strömer was enabled to travel for his health. He went to Switzerland, and after a two years' stay he came back—to die. Christmas Eve, 1888, Hjalmar Strömer, the Freethinker and scientist, paid the penalty of his love of truth. He died a martyr for our cause, a victim to Christian love and charity. Let his fate be a warning to those Freethinkers who believe that some good may result from co-operation with Christians in establishment of the Nine Demands. The poison in the snake's fangs is activ even when the snake is dead.

Gold Money Fallacy.

The objection to the greenback by the specie men is based entirely on the want of value in the material. You might as well write on a bit of paper, "This is a house," or, "This is a cow," and offer it as a house or a cow, as to write on it, "This is one dollar." A dollar must hav value in it equal to one hundred cents. This is the sum of all the long writings on the subject. Now let us see. If by writing, "This is a house," or "a cow," the receiver could hav all the use of either, how very foolish to go to the expense of building a house, or buying and feeding a cow. But the paper dollar certainly does all the work that a gold dollar does as a money representativ. All that money pieces ever do is to pay debts or differences arising between exchanges of labor, commodities, and the like. The error of the specie men arises from their confounding the representativs of money with the thing called money, as though we should call our deeds our real titles instead of evidences of titles. Anything the public hav full trust in—that is, credit—will do the work of money. Money, then, is credit in circulation by representativs. "But the paper dollar has no intrinsic value." Pause a moment. "What is anything worth but as 'tis valued?" says Shakspere. Opinion rules the world, makes one thing precious and another worthless, and even wins battles, as Napoleon said. What is a diamond? Till of late it had no value in use, but was always most precious in opinion. If we despised gold no one would receive it. If a commercial people hav in time come to regard a sign upon paper as good for the value thereby expressed through the potency of the honor and industry of several million people; if they even value it higher than they do trinkets or jewelry, who shall say they are wrong?

Place a diamond valued at ten thousand dollars, also an ingot of gold valued at about the same, beside a bundle of greenbacks that express a value of ten thousand five hundred dollars, before an intelligent merchant for him to accept either one on equal terms—which will he take? That will settle all questions of value.

There is one more consideration. All banks in cities settle their differences at the clearing-houses by a simple confronting of credit and debit. Infinit millions' worth are thus exchanged without a dollar of what is called money, i.e., money signs.

At all times the debt of a creditor is good with the one who owes him to the amount of the debt. In our time people and government are one. Government is composed of a part of the people doing service as soldiers, sailors, contractors, furnishers, and civil servants; there are also creditors and pensioners. People owe government revenue to pay these, which is constantly accruing. Government owes people service, material, etc., with the same regularity. Although a money sign is used to settle these accounts, what in reality is going on? Nothing but an exchange of commodities for labor and materials. Reduced to the final analysis, government is doing labor, etc., and people furnishing commodities, etc., in exchange, and that is all that is doing the world over. Any sign given to a government servant may show the service has been done and given by the servant to people brings the commodity and is evidence to the tax-collector of the fact. They who insist that it is necessary to hire people to dig and coin rare metals to be used in the affair, are as ridiculous as would be two men who mutually owed each other equal values, and instead of a simple cancellation, went about to buy some metals or bills of some one else to settle it.

All manner of fallacy is used by the specie advocates to confuse us. But let us keep to the one question—what is money? what does it do? It is anything the public will receive in confidence, i. e., confidence represented by signs in circulation. If people will not take paper that ends it. If they insisted on shells that would settle it. And there is not one thing possible to be done with metal money which paper will not do. Make it the sole legal tender, as you do gold or silver, and it will remain the standard, a dollar always equal to one hundred cents, no matter how much you inflate. Make anything a legal tender and allow other kinds to compete with it, if you inflate it, down it goes in price. Gold has fallen thus one-half in price at times. He who denies it will deny the shining sun. Our sixty million genuin full legal tenders advanced to two hundred and forty cents during our war, while the non-full legal tender became almost worthless. "The power of taxing is the best basis for a currency the world ever saw," said Jefferson and Calhoun. But they did not know the potency of "the full and sole lawful tender."

A "Pulpit" Up to Date.

Is the "pulpit" out of date? Yes and no. Yes, if its basis is that of commands, exhortations, morals, and religion grounded on ancient books of authority or formularies of the past. No, if it attempts to inspire the people with the highest and best attested convictions of its own time.

As a method of reaching the popular heart with facts for intellectual conviction, with inspiration to moral action, with reverence toward nature and eternal law, the pulpit has had no equal. The school may gradually be taking a part of this work to itself, but for a long time yet, and especially in an age of transition of human outlook and of consequent confusion, there is even greater need than ever of earnest, honest, highly cultured summaries of scientific knowledge on the great phases of human life.

Then, the force of social organization as represented by the pulpit as a center has, as yet, no substitute as a humanizing power. To some extent we hav begun to utilize this in our democratic politics, yet the transient interest of the subjects but ill adapts them to meet the deepest needs. Only around the broader, deeper principles of man's eternal relations to nature and to his kind do the feelings of reverence and sympathy thrive best. It belongs to the ideal types of character in different ages to furnish the substance-matter for the creeds of those ages. In the ancient world it was the prophet; in the early Christian and Middle Age, the saint; in our time, the scientist, who furnishes the articles for our "creed;" while the pulpit, through priest, preacher, and lecturer, disseminates the doctrins and exhorts to their consequent duties.

To many minds, made over-anxious by the evolutionary changes in fundamental human conceptions, every serious attempt to formulate the new creed, i. e., the world and human or cosmical and ethical outlooks, will be welcome. In such spirit hav I compiled

A SCIENTIST'S CREED.—A.D. 1891.

I.—Cosmical Outlook:

1. To him time has no beginning and space no bounds. All phenomena hav existence in terms of these.
2. Two eternal elements constitute the basis of all things and worlds; matter and energy (spirit). Each appears in different forms: matter as oxygen, carbon, iron, etc., some seventy-two in all; energy as gravitation, cohesion, chemism, electricity, life.
3. The eternal energy in things controls itself and all the ends of existence. It is "God," yet not an anthropomorphic being, as the old outlook conceived, for it can not be described in human terms. It is everywhere; the basis, the essence, the molder, the upward pusher of all form and life.
4. The earth and the stars are but phases of existence, are evolutions from other forms of moving matter. In their once fluid, now solid, strata crusts is to be found the record of their present formation.
5. In the fossil life of the strata and in the stages of present individual life from ovum to maturity, are to be read the transitions of world life and the laws of its development—the one all-comprehensiv law of evolution.
6. Ages and eons, not years and centuries, are the units for expressing the time ratios of life on the globe.
7. Man, the most complex life-form, and the one with the broadest consciousness, is subject to the same laws. His antiquity is very great, and in his primitiv condition individual and social development were largely controled by environment.
8. With the age of higher reason, i. e., broader conscious comprehension, came the possibilities of civilization. Here begins the

II.—Ethical Outlook:

1. He does not question existence, but accepts the fact of birth and takes the world as his senses find it. He takes for granted that life is for some sort of good.
2. If the object of life is life, all that in the long run favors its development (even of a deeper sort) is a good.
3. But lives are numerous, life experience is many-sided and complex; hence interests often seem to conflict. All hav the same basis of right to the highest life compatible with the potentiality of their nature and their personal effort. Therefore the rights of others must be respected.
4. Mankind never "fell," but, as every evidence shows, has been through millenniums slowly rising. The age-long history of human struggle and progress givs confidence in human powers.
5. Hence, the man of science believes in personal individual use of faculties, in independent reasoning as opposed to credulous conformity, since not only the highest progress of the race awaits this help, but genuin character likewise can only come through it.
6. He believes, then, in human possibility, here and now; in a life that knows and enjoys nature, is righteous toward others, controler of itself, calm in its contemplations, and, though ever aspiring and progressing, is not miserable because it has not the unattained.
7. He believes such human ideal is attainable only by human coöperation, by each acting from the point of view of others and of the race, even in competitions. Competition alone, or with the interests of self chiefly in view, is the law of barbarism and savagedom. By it brute force is kept predominant and constantly sanctions the survival of the strongest and most selfish.
8. Nothing, then, is more evident than that the chief business of all intelligent beings is to learn nature's methods of furthering life in all its sorts and hights. To this end he believes in searching nature—the holiest of all sacred books—whose discovered and verified laws are the highest scriptural guide of life. For the fullest obedience to these we are in the strictest manner responsible. (It adds nothing to their authority or greatness to label them the laws or word of God, nor whether they be found in ancient books or modern ones.)
9. He believes in the scientific method and no other. By it has come all knowledge, whether man knew it or not.
10. The highest religious feeling is the sense of duty in discovering and obeying the laws of man's being, of nature's being, of man's relations to man, and of man's relations to nature.

Always subject to modification by discovery of more facts.

A Voice from the West Indies.

Truth is stranger than fiction. This has been illustrated over and over again, so that it seems a needless undertaking to convince any of its truthfulness. We see examples of it almost daily.

If one is to estimate the standard of a community's state of morality by the facilities afforded them in the shape of a good Christian education and religious training, one can and would not hesitate to pass a sentence, after a cursory glance, that the West India islands, as a whole, stand second to no place in the wide world. There are more places of worship than people to go to them; all the different sects, religions, and denominations are fairly represented, and no apparent lack of beetles and Jerusalem toucans to take charge of the erring flock.

But, despite all these things, we do not think the West Indies are surpassed in any part of the habitable globe for a belief in that form of superstition known as religion, in fact, all kinds of superstitions. Whether it is due to the overplus of religious pills that the people take or not, is left for a close observer to say, but we cannot deny the fact that where we find the most religion, ignorance flourishes with such splendor as only to rival vegetation in a tropical forest.

Religious training is most admirably suited as a nursery in which all other forms of superstition can be matured, especially so-called witchcraft, which is closely allianced to theological religion. The belief in God, the Holy Ghost, angels, the Bible, and all the accessories which constitute part of the Christian and other religions, must necessarily find a place in the space devoted to superstition.

But what is most observable is this fact, that although we are bordering on the twentieth century, and in an age of advanced civilization, the debasing practice of obeah still exists in our midst, and flourishes in all its pristin vigor, and numbers amongst its votaries many who, from their education, social standing, and advantages, ought to be the first to cry down evils of this sort, as also of all kinds which I class under the head of superstition.

But hypocrisy is a mask under which a great many can hide their faces, and but for it the world would be to-day rid of all forms of superstitions.

The Christian and other religions hav failed to accomplish any direct benefit to these poor people, and it behooves Secularism and its teachers and votaries to do all it can to accomplish this desideratum: The world is my country; to do good is my religion.

The Fair Must Open Sundays.

STEWARDSON, ILL., Jan. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am in favor of the World's Fair being open on Sunday the same as any other day—opposed to the five million loan unless open seven days in the week. Send catalog. F. G. MIDKIFF.

Bennett's Big Boy.

HENDERSON, MINN., Jan. 4, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I like the old child of our D. M. Bennett in its new dress. It is a good big boy and is growing yet—will surely attain to manhood in time. That new dress cost money, I know.

Yours truly, H. J. SEIGNEURET, M.D.

Wants Tracts Distributed.

COALING, ALA., Dec. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to a new subscriber. I liv in a perfect hell-hole of orthodoxy, but yet by perseverance I beat many others.

The Christians flood the country with sophistical documents. My son's name was seen in the Freethinkers' Magazine. Since then he has received some of the bitterest tracts printed a ornhill, Boston, Mass. Now, why do not you do that way? If you would print small notices: "$50 or $100 reward for just one good saying that Christ said that was not taught before he was born," and send them to your subscribers, and let all that will stick them up, it will be excellent. It is a poor soldier that is not worth his ordnance.

"Yours for Fight."

GREENE, N. Y., Jan. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money for which send me my "Bible" for two years. I never had much faith in the accomplishing of very good results from the American Secular Union, as it has been conducted, and now that its president during the last two years has "run it into the ground," I want to make the proposition that we make a political issue of our demands and principles if we ever expect to obtain justice by the establishing of new laws or the repeal of obnoxious ones. The fact is too plain to be disputed that our enemies are taking every opportunity, through Congress and the legislatures, to drive a nail here and there in our coffin, until they hope to "spike" us down too solid for "resurrection" in this world or the next. Yours for fight,

GEO. W. TILLOTSON.

Can Print Opponents' Sides.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Jan. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You wished to hear how your readers appreciated your paper, and if they had any suggestions to make. Well, I come in rather late, maybe, but I can say in all candor that it suits me, because it givs such varied information and fair play on all subjects. It seems your foundation is so solid and true, as far as you are conscious, that you can publish the side of your opponent without so much as thinking, "Damn you!" This is a higher state of civilization than many good-meaning people hav reached yet, but I hope the time will come soon when all editors can occupy the same lofty position of justice and righteousness.

As for myself, I hav in my own mind settled the ghost or spook business, even to a God ghost, or spook, for some time; yet I like to hear from those who hav not, and are still laboring in the line of discovering evidence that will convince all.

So of every other subject. I like to read the honest ideas of different persons, and I hope your paper will keep right on and giv us all the new truths as fast as science unfolds them.

I herewith send you money for a renewal of my subscription and Bible Pictures. JOHN M. GROH.

They Sit and Marvel at Ghost Stories.

EDDYVILLE, N. Y., Jan. 31, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please send me one dozen letters to be sent to the World's Fair directors to hav it kept open on Sunday. I think with a little work some of my neighbors can be induced to sign and mail those letters to the officials of said Fair. In my immediate vicinity there liv quite a number of Infidels, but, as one of your correspondents says, it is a very hard task to get them interested in that kind of literature: They are down on orthodoxy, but still take so little interest that they will not even subscribe for your valuable paper. There is a Methodist Episcopal church and a Universalist church in this place. The Methodist Episcopals hav some fifteen members—the most ignorant people in this community. A sky-pilot comes here twice each month to talk over his drivel and collect tithes of the poor dupes that sit and marvel at the wonderful ghost stories told them by their little narrow-gage sky-pilot. But send on those letters and I will do what I can to scatter them where they will do the most good.

Yours for mental liberty, F. LARABEE.

Hav a Secular Sabbath.

ST. ANSGAR, IA., Feb. 8, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I think a good and rational checkmate on the Sabbath howlers, who claim no religious object in their movement, would be to vigorously push a bill demanding a day of rest from labor and not hav it conflict with any particular religion or harmonize with any one. It would be best to create a rule expressly on a secular basis. Say that the bill demands that every 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th of each month shall be a national day of rest. For this present year the days of rest would come as follows: For January, Thursdays; February, Sundays; March, Mondays; April, Thursdays; May, Saturdays; June, Tuesdays, etc. It will be seen at once that nothing could be more fair, in a country like ours, than such a day of rest, and it would not favor any particular religious sect and would thus be a secular measure as it should be.

There is no danger that the priests would permit such a law to be passed. They would much rather be satisfied with things as they are. But such a bill, vigorously pressed, separately or as a substitute for the Sunday law, would be a stronger argument and appeal to American principles than any other way of attack. I wish some one able to do so would take up the Sunday question along this line and prosecute it in earnest and haste.

Respectfully, DR. A. J. CLAUSEN.

Shameful Outrages in Schools.

DAVENPORT, WASH., Feb. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for the Bible Picture Book. I want it to show what a monstrous book the Bible is. The constitution of the state of Washington is as near secular as can be constructed. But the Bible is continually kept in the public schools contrary to the command of Attorney-General Jones, who said that the Bible must be kept out of all the public schools. The pious fanatics hav no regard for law, rights, or justice—driving scholars of Freethinkers from public schools and holding revivals in the same, and burning the wood and oil that the people hav to pay for. A boy of Mr. Peter Selde was expelled from school in Davenport for the alleged cause that he did not believe in a God. The teacher told him that anyone that did not believe in a God could not come to her school.

There is work for the Liberals. I wrote a letter to our representativ, John L. Wilson, in regard to having the World's Fair kept open Sundays, and received a favorable reply, which I inclose herein.

H. L. WILSON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVS, U. S.,
WASHINGTON, Jan. 11, 1892.

H. L. WILSON, ESQ., Davenport, Wash.,

Dear Sir: Yours of a recent date at hand, and I hav to inform you that the same shall receive every consideration. "Sabbath day was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath day." Very truly yours,

JOHN L. WILSON.

Christians Know Nothing of Church or Bible.

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., Jan. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: If you can spare me space I will giv you a small sketch of my experience among church people. I was traveling on the cars between Milledgeville and Savannah, Ill., before Christmas. The car was crowded, and from the conversation they were all church-members but the writer, and there were three sky-pilots in the band. They were returning from a church dedication. And they got to telling twisters that at some former performance that had taken place some dandy of a preacher could make the poor dupes come down with their hard-earned cash by telling nice yarns. He told one of army times that set the poor cranks frantic. There were two soldiers on the skirmish line, and they came to an empty cabin, and one proposed that they should go in and pray that the good Lord should deliver the enemy into their hands, as of old, and that both should pray out aloud. So they went at it. But one got the start of the other and he made such a racket the other forgot to pray, but listened to the other until he got so excited he could not stand it any longer. He jumped up and slapped Brother Jones on the back and yelled at the top of his voice, "Giv them hell, Brother Jones! Giv them hell, Brother Jones!" And then they went off in a regular roar of laughter. The writer was the only one in the whole crowd that had a sober face, and if they could hav read the thoughts of that lonesome Infidel they would not hav enjoyed it with such a relish.

I find that nine out of ten church people know nothing whatever of their church's history, and a great deal less of their Bible. So we Freethinkers hav to make great allowance for the poor dupes.

M. H. WILLFONG.

A Conscienceless Sunday-Breaker.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Late this fall I was burning trash and weeds on Sunday on either side of the road on the west side of my place, and a Christian gentleman (?) came along and holloed out as he passed like a fellow that had his mouth full of hot mush, "By God! what are you setting fire out on Sunday for?" I was stumped for a few seconds at his uncivil and profane way of asking the question, but looking toward the fire and seeing that it was blazing up about six or eight feet high on both sides of the road, and thinking as he passed between the two fires no doubt that it recalled vivid recollections of hell, and knowing how Christians dread the fire, I answered him back not uncivilly again, but said, "Why, the weeds and trash seem to burn just as well to-day as they would any other day."

The Sunday-school Union of the state of Kansas met in Salina this fall, and M. A. M., an item-gatherer for Salina valley and New Cambria for the Salina Union, asked the question, "What has become of all the church-going people of Salina with all her churches that there are but forty in attendance at the State Sunday-school Union?" I would like to say to the good Christian sister that from her standpoint it does not speak well for Salina or the state either, but from ours it speaks well, for both people are simply getting their eyes open—that is all.

You will please find $12 inclosed to pay for new subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER at club rates. I hav three more on my subscription list that hav not paid in time to send in with this club, but I am going to continue soliciting for about a month yet whenever I run across anyone that would be likely to take it. And I am very likely to find them, because every Liberal I run across I inquire if he knows of any more, and if it is inconvenient for me to see them I tell him to see them. By this means we will be able to canvass the Liberal element pretty thoroughly.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

Some Long-Headed Opinions.

ATTLEBORO, Jan. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please send three Bible Picture Books, one Koran, and other books according to inclosed list.

I send a couple of slips from two different papers to show what fools some editors are to notice such vaporings as hav racked the brains of Professor Totten.

If you choose to send me some of those sample pages of the "Text-Book" I will do the best I can with them. I will send $1 to help the cause of Freethought any way you think best. I intended to send the Secular Union $5, and will yet if they ever get over shillyshallying with the church.

I was fourteen years a member of the Baptist church in my young days, but when I allowed myself to think I soon got rid of all such rubbish, and now, although I do not deny the existence of a God, I can not see a particle of proof of his existence, and I would be as big a fool as a Christian to believe a thing without proof.

Christians look with contempt on the heathen. But suppose a bright boy to be brought up on an island with a fair education but in utter ignorance of any religious ideas whatever. He has never heard or read of a God or hereafter of any kind. Well, this man gets into a boat and drifts out of sight of land and is picked up by a ship and carried to a strange country, and there he sees some people bowing down and praying to an image. He asks what they do that for. He is told that is a God, and the thing is explained to him by one of the worshipers. Well, the same day he sees some more people worshiping the picture of a woman, and he asks more questions. He is told that is a picture of the mother of God, and it is explained to him. Well, the same day he sees more people who kneel down and shut their eyes and talk to nothing that he can see. Now, which would he think was the biggest fool?

E. C. SLY.

A Facetious D.D.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: My relation to the so-called Christian church has been such as to bring upon me the epithets of Antichrist and Infidel, and the corresponding anathema, boycott, and persecution, for over forty-two years. This, as a matter of course, had a tendency to cultivate my kicking propensity. About eight years of this time I spent in the lecture field, often meeting with experience similar to that of Dr. McCormick at Aurora, Neb. Of late years I hav been otherwise engaged, but still kept up the fight by doing a little missionary work now and again. At a bookstore where I get my TRUTH SEEKER I hav often bought out their entire stock of back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other similar publications and distributed them where they might do the most good. In a Catholic part of this city, known as "Corktown," I once induced a newsdealer to get THE TRUTH SEEKER and keep it exposed upon his counter, with the understanding that I would take off his hands what would be left unsold at the end of a month. You may guess at the result. The newsman had a very narrow escape at the hands of a mob who thought he needed killing for having such a wicked publication for sale. He said his best trade was in the sale of sporting papers, the Police News, the Police Gazette, novels, and boxing-gloves. Of the latter he has a large assortment in stock. I still continued my missionary work, never once suspecting that I was acting the bigot or making a fool of myself, until THE TRUTH SEEKER gave me a pointer by heading my contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 12th as "A Bigot's Directory." Now I can see myself as others see me. Thanks.

Later.—The above was written about a month ago and laid away to cool off, but instead of cooling off, I hav since concluded to reënlist in the veteran corps of Freethinkers, and to reënter the lecture field as soon as I can arrange to leave my present business in the hands of my successors, and to fight it out on that line if it takes the balance of my lifetime.

CARL BLITZ, D.D.

P.S.—That D.D. stands for Dutch Dude.

[For the benefit of other readers, not of this friend, who we fear is a hardened wag, we will say that our words were, "A Bigots' Directory," not "A Bigot's Directory."—ED. T. S.]

Help Us Get These Demands, Brother.

SANTA FÉ, N. M., Jan. 15, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: After a long time I hav succeeded in getting a new subscriber to your valuable paper—a young man who was brought up a Catholic. He had read some of my papers and liked them very much. Perhaps when he sees my Bible Picture Book he may subscribe for it also. You hav many books on your list that I would like very much to hav; it is only for lack of means that I do not hav them.

There are a number of Liberals here, and if we could hav a good lecture to let us into the light of truth a little more and giv us new ideas in the matter and tell us how to organize and lay out the rules and regulations of Liberalism, we might better know how to work on Freethought. No one enjoys reading Freethought literature more than I do. Some of us would like to know the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Hoping some day to be able to get more subscribers to your paper, yours for liberty and truth, MRS. C. A. BERLETTS.

[We append the Nine Demands.—ED. T. S.]

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.
2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.
3. The repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one justified by physiological and other secular reasons.
4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.
5. The abolition of ecclesiastical chaplaincies paid out of the public treasury.
6. The discontinuance of the practice of the appointment by the president of the United States and by the governors of the several states of religious festivals and fasts.
7. The substitution of a solemn affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, in place of the common forms of a judicial oath, in the courts and in all other departments of the government.
8. The defense through the courts of any American citizen whose equal religious and political rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may hav held or expressed on the subject of religion.
9. The promulgation, by all peaceable and orderly means, of the great principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity; and the protection of the state from the encroachments of the church.

Refused Communication.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Feb. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote an earnest letter of remonstrance to the editor of the Practical Farmer in Philadelphia, and with it sent the following letter to the editress of the "Home Circle" department of that paper, which I read. I wrote him if he did not send my letter to the lady. He was silent on the subject. He was not as just and Liberal as I had supposed.

The letter follows this. J. H. COOK.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Feb. 1, 1892.

TO THE EDITRESS OF THE HOME CIRCLE IN THE PRACTICAL FARMER, Dear Madam: I see in the number for January 2d your own statement that you had refused to publish a letter to your department because it was from an Infidel or Atheist.

I am both, and hav been for fifty years. I claim my right, natural and constitutional, and the right of the person whose letter you rejected, to be the same as the rights of your orthodox contributors, who mix up—and you too—so much piety and religious exhortation with their practical good sense on secular and material subjects. Justice demands that if you publish orthodoxy, you should also publish heterodoxy. If you allow your contributors to advocate God, Christ, the devil, a future, heaven, and hell, the sin of dancing, and so on, you ought also to allow Infidels to express their opinions. I suppose hundreds of them subscribe for, read, and appreciate the Practical Farmer. If you do not, and will not, do that, you are a narrow-minded bigot, a traitor to liberty, justice, and equality, and your proper place is to edit an orthodox religious paper, instead of a department in the Practical Farmer, which ought to be entirely secular and never publish the private religious or Infidel views of any contributor.

What would be thought of Mr. Terry, or any other writer, male or female, in the other various departments, if they should intersperse, as you and many of your correspondents do, pious cant, and call upon God and Christ, and assume "holy horror," because many people dance and do not go to meeting and try to save their souls, and so on?

I read a letter in your department, and am pleased when I get a new idea or suggestion, which all need to hav, to make the most of life, but I am repelled and disgusted when the writer attaches pious exhortation, religious bigotry, blind prejudices, and senseless platitudes to show (?) how much better and purer the writer is than those who do not see nature and the great All through her ignorant and perverted mental eyes.

Josh Billings says: "It is better not to know so much than to know so many things that ain't so;" and that truth applies to you.

I object most earnestly to religion being advocated in the Practical Farmer. You and your contributors write of what God can do to save the soul. Your God never answered one prayer, for the good reason that he does not exist. He is a man-made myth. The priests and demagogs keep up the God delusion, that they may liv off the labor of their blind dupes, who, like you, hav more faith than reason or science.

Whatever is to me true and good for humanity, I advocate; but I abhor shams and inhuman absurdities.

Wishing you all the blessings of this life, and a far livelier sense of justice and equality, I am,

Yours for the highest, best, and happiest life, now and here, J. H. COOK.

The Church Unmercifully Chastised.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Now is the winter of our discontent. Orthodoxy, the old superstitious hydra, vociferates the doctrin of the immaculate Wangdoodle. The clergy realize that the puritanic power is slipping away from their arbitrary manipulation. The religious sycophants are writhing in abject fear and trembling at their waning influence. They want the world to stand still one day of seven. They also want a law to compel people to hie away to a God-office and listen to the ranting of knaves spouting superstition and clerical vaporings. They are scheming to deprive the laboring men of the privilege of an intellectual, instructiv exhibition and compel them to attend church and pay their hard-earned cash to knave preachers and sycophantic howlers, the effete and the hypocrit. The government will stand upon its dignity and the World's Columbian Exhibition will be a fact with no break to disturb its harmony to accommodate any sect or syndicate. All days of the week will be observed alike to pope, pagan, or gentile, the antics of the animal notwithstanding. The American eagle's scream will be heard high on the battlement of American liberty.

They, the orthodox, are scheming to deprive the wage-workers of congenial recreation, and demand their Sunday expense for the benefit of the church. They say the Sunday outlay to the Fair must go to the church. What an immaculate dictum, what magnanimous proselyting, the assumption that the great I Am needs worldly galore to boost his prerogativ. You hydra-headed monstrosity, are you not ashamed to utter such balderdash? Wipe off your capacious jaws; be less conspicuous; indulge in less effrontery. You hav long sought the long end of the teeter-board. Now mark the appended prophecy: You never will proselyte this splendid government to the dictates of church fallacy or monopoly. You will never reach that goal. The church is a fraud; the government is a fact. Now, my mythical dear sir, mark the utterance: Your dying throes will soon land your parasitic souls in a nonentity.

An Agnostic Funeral Address.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The funeral of our old friend, C. A. Snow, Esq., occurred at 1 P.M. to-day, at his residence, and was in its main feature such as he had desired and was conducted in accordance with the wishes he expressed only a few days before he sank into that slumber called death. The body rested in a very rich black casket near the center of the parlor. Flowers in tasteful forms were on the casket and stand, and perfumed the melancholy air of the whole house with a grateful fragrance. Mr. Snow was seventy-four years old; was twice married; his first wife died several years ago, from whom he had a son and daughter, who with tender hearts and loving hands faithfully administered every possible comfort to their fond father in his last hours upon earth. Mr. Snow's life had always been one of business. He had large rich farms and well stocked. Years ago he was a drover, and shipped many carloads of cattle and sheep to New York city. He was also interested in the mill business and manufactured large quantities of lumber of late years. About fourteen years ago he moved from his farm to the village and ran a hardware store and post-office and the office of a justice, and for a few years past dealt largely in agricultural implements. Mr. Snow has held many offices of trust and responsibility during his long and noble life, and his friends are legion. Mr. Snow was a friend of intellectual liberty—of the Procl mation of Emancipation. He was glad to see his country without a slave and the American flag without a stain. He reaps the reward of an honest man. His political life was one of honesty and nobility—a certificate of manhood, courage, and true patriotism. He worked for, and voted, his honest convictions; and for such a man I hav every respect. Mr. Snow was Agnostic in religion; that is, he "didn't know," but "hoped." About three months ago I met Uncle Chauncey, as we called him, and this is the last time I had any conversation with him upon religion. He then asked me if I had memorized the "Tribute" I had read to him a few days before. I told him I had. Said he, "Rob, please repeat the last paragraph of it." I did so and it highly pleased the old gentleman, and he then said, "Those are my ideas exactly, Rob." The words I repeated then I giv you now:

"In this drama of our human life all are actors and no one knows his part. In this great play the scenes are shifted by unknown forces, and the commencement, plot, and end are still unknown—are still unguessed. One by one the players leave the stage and others take their places. There is no pause—the play goes on. No prompter's voice is heard, and no one has the slightest clew to what the next scene is to be.

"Will this great drama hav an end? Will the curtain fall at last? Will it rise again upon some other stage? Reason says perhaps, and hope still whispers yes!"

Yes! Mr. Snow "hoped." And which of us does not? Friends, let us believe that death is kind, that it giv back all it takes away. It only removes our dear ones behind the veil. Let us "hope" they liv and love us still. Here our hearts are pierced by the barbed arrows of bereavement; here we repeat farewells and plant by the sacred dust the willow and the cypress. There, let us "hope," we will liv and love forever! Let us not believe earth is man's only abiding-place. It cannot be, friends, that life is a bubble cast up by the ocean of eternity to float a moment upon its waves of foam and then sink into nothingness. Else why these high and glorious aspirations to liv again that leap like angels from the temples of our hearts, forever wandering unsatisfied? It must be, we are born for a higher destiny than earth. We hav no fear of the future. And the soul we respected, that takes its leave from life's battle, had no fear! His work is done, and he rests in peace beneath pure white snow, by the side of the wife he loved and who loved him, in his painless palace of peace in Elm creek cemetery.

Profound Thoughts in Elegant Phrases.

OFFICE OF COUNTY JUDGE, BON HOMME COUNTY, SOUTH DAKOTA.—OREGON RICHMOND, JUDGE.

TYNDALL, SOUTH DAKOTA, Feb. 5, 1892.

TO PUBLISHER TRUTH SEEKER, New York, My Dear Sir and Friend: I am an old reader and subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find that I cannot very well afford to be without it. I therefore desire to renew my subscription at once.

I hav forgotten the price, and hav no time just now to look even for your exact address.

I shall, if acceptable, be an occasional contributor in the interests of correct thought. I inclose something that was suggested by an occurrence in this vicinity yesterday in the death of an old man who for many years has been free from superstition, but who, in the hour of death, was reimpressed by the old notions, and "died in the arms of Jesus."

Very respectfully and fraternally yours,
DR. O. RICHMOND.

STILL AMONG THE SHADOWS.

We are still breathing dead men's breath; still standing among the cadavers of the dead centuries. Our precedents in law, medicin, and religion smell of the graveyards of Egypt, Athens, and Rome. The mind is fettered with tradition. There is fashion in thought as in costume. Is it not somewhat singular that men and women were ever self-willed enough to improve upon the primitiv costume said to hav been Adam's and Eve's?

It is because of this blind subjugation to the past that we cling so tenaciously to so much that is palpably absurd and logically nonsensical in the sciences and in political and religious and biological beliefs. We accept propositions as maxims for no other reason than that they are musty with age, that they come to us shrouded with the mystic veil of the centuries. Mathematics, or, more properly speaking, arithmetic, being an abstract and demonstrable science, has exploded, banished, or improved the solutions of the first algebraists and geometricians, but still accepts religiously many of their undemonstrable hypotheses.

Who, even at this day, so bold as to repeat the heroic daring of Tycho Brahe and attack the correctness of the Copernican theory of the universes? Who is there hardy enough to challenge the accepted theory of the origin of the Gulf stream? that of the trade winds? that of sound, light, disease? that of the creation of something from nothing? that of nerve fluid? that of muscular irritability? the immemorially and patently absurd distinction between "organic and inorganic" substances? that of the distinction between the moral and intellectual natures in man? that of the existence of an individual, eternal, and personal soul, separate and distinct from the organized dust it is claimed to animate? the utterly untenable, mystical, and debasing theory of "disease germs?" that any departure from the assumed standard of health is an unnatural condition, as if in nature there can be anything "unnatural," as if an "overruling, omnipotent, all-merciful, and just and loving Universal" could bring upon man the curse of the debasing, foul, obnoxious, detestable, abhorrent, and excruciating endemics, epidemics, "scourges," and pestilences that from old time's earliest dawn hav afflicted, deteriorated, debauched, and exterminated the countless generations of men? that asserting the finite and powerless man, and the infinit and all-powerful God, yet admits in man the creativ power to convert "inanimate substances" into "living tissue?" that "Sleep is nature's rest from toil?" that the infant, born to-day of Jones and madam, has "eternal life" in "damnation or redemption," although the years of its life are counted only from its birth, and not from the uncommencing cycle of the ages, as should be the case were its life "eternal?" For, at the best, when the foundation facts are reached, these theories are simply theories, the progenies of prolific minds, exuberant with the resources of imagery and "dreams and visions of the night."

Intelligent men and women reject truths that conflict with these dead and rotten carcasses of the past, though these truths are as patent to reason as the sun is palpable at mid-day. They still stand "lost in amazement and credulity" worshiping shadows of substance, clinging to legends and traditions that melt away from candid scrutiny as would snow-banks under the perpendicular rays of an August sun.

Placed in a world of mystery, where Nature hides her secrets with jealous care; confronted at every step with legions of opposing obstacles; dazzled by the infinit and inexplicable confusion of objects by which he is surrounded, man, with the unbounded egotism of the mythological Jupiter, setting his face against the splendid beauties among which he moves, rejecting Nature's coy invitations to embrace and enjoy her, to master her wonderful problems of life and sense, and thus to enlarge the material enjoyments of this existence, expends nine-tenths of his precious life in vain attempts to solve the unsolvable problem, "What shall succeed to all this?"

Man, with the boundless experience and lessons of countless centuries, whose accumulating burthen of years has made the soil of old earth fertil with the decayed bodies of his immemorial ancestry, is still too timid to get out of the ruts made by primitiv man, and which are worn so deep by countless processions of "blind followers of the blind," that he cannot even see the clear sky of truth overhead. He still clings tenaciously and stubbornly to political, religious, and social creeds whose final analyses show them in forms that make Reason blush and Justice hide her face in very shame.

A convention of delegates chosen in primary caucus, meet and formulate a political platform made up of big-sounding words and skilfully marshaled phrases, which, reduced to their fundamentals, are meaningless and impracticable; a conclave of pious hierarchs assemble and revise or devise a creed whose web and woof are subtility and mysticism, but tinctured with just enough reason to make it palatable; and medical associations, composed of members whose enforced skepticism is notorious, but who hav not the courage to cut adrift from the legends and traditions that retard medical progress of to-day, like all the rest, still bow themselvs before Authority; and bend their knees before Precedent. DR. O. RICHMOND.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Jesus Paid.

A Christian minister, to begin:
"Children dear, why hav you been
Out of doors, in the fields at play,
On this holy Sabbath day?
Why did you not stay in the house
And be as silent as a mouse?"

CHILDREN:

"'Cause reason says it is no harm
To recreate upon the farm;
Therefore,
Rather than go to Sunday-school
To learn nonsense, or 'become a fool
For Christ's sake,'
We mean to do just as we please—
On Sunday play among the trees."

M.—"But don't you know that is a sin?"

C.—"No matter if we sin commit;
You say that Jesus died for it.
Though we should sin our time away
And wicked be till old and gray,
Just before we come to die,
On Jesus's death we will rely,
And say on him we do believe:
Then he our sins will all forgiv!
Think of it!
Therefore, if that indeed is so,
We can to play on Sunday go;
Your Jesus Christ will pay our debt;
Then sin we may and never fret!
To say:
Jesus died sinners to save,'
Only encourages each knave
To steal, and lie, and curse, and swear,
And scratch, and bite, and, if they dare,
Even to kill in angry fit.
All right,
Jesus Christ has paid for it!
Such lessons, taught at Sunday-schools,
No wonder we'd believe as fools;
Weekdays are just as good, we know,
As Sundays are, in fact, and so
We loving boys and girls will play,
And happy be on every day.
Therefore,
If others' rights we don't invade,
We hav no cause to be afraid;
And if our parents dear do say
That on the Sabbath we can play,
Then it will be no sin, you see.
So says our friend, Elisha B."

Prehistoric Man in Kansas.

MY YOUNG LIBERAL FRIENDS: I am much interested in archeological research in Kansas, and by careful observation I find that Atchison county affords a rich field for the antiquarian. Old camping-grounds, village sites, and open-air workshops are innumerable in this county, especially along the river bluffs, and in the fields bordering on some stream. A number of mounds hav also been discovered. An open-air workshop is a place where the Indians made their implements and weapons. Wherever such a place is found, it will be observed that there is an accumulation of chips of flint, and broken or unfinished implements. At old camping-grounds the earth presents the appearance of having been burnt in many places, and is intermixed with fragments of pottery, chips of flint, and bones of animals, etc. The writer has personally found a number of these places. One of them is at Port Williams, on a stream called Walnut creek, about eight miles southeast of the city of Atchison, and another is five miles south of the city on a stream called Owl creek. Both of these streams empty into the Missouri river, and these old aboriginal camping-grounds are only a short distance from the river. A great many relics hav been observed at these places, from time to time, among them some extra fine specimens of stone axes, celts, pestles, hammers, drills, scrapers, war-club heads, arrow-heads, pipes, etc., most of which are in possession of the writer.

One day while visiting the old camping-ground on Owl creek, the writer concluded that he would make further searches, thinking there might be some graves or mounds in the vicinity. He climbed to the top of a high and rugged bluff, directly opposit to the camping-ground, and he had not searched a great while before his most sanguin expectations were fulfilled. On the projecting point of the bluff he discovered two mounds which had evidently been there for a long stretch of years. He went home, procured a pick and spade, and with his two brothers and Mr. C. A. Bruner, again repaired to the scene of the mounds for the purpose of making excavations. At the depth of about two feet human bones were found. They were in a bad state of decomposition, and only small pieces could be removed, and they would crumble to dust with the pressure of the finger and thumb. The bones had evidently been under the action of fire, for some of them were black or charred, and pieces of charcoal, burnt earth and stones, were found among the remains. The writer sent some of these charred bones to the curator of prehistoric anthropology in the National Museum at Washington, asking his opinion about the bones, and he replied that there was no evidence of the bones being burnt. But this gentleman is certainly mistaken. According to physiological research, if a bone is burnt, and all the animal matter be not consumed, it will turn black, while, on the other hand, if all the animal matter is consumed, the bone will retain its whiteness and can be crumbled into a plain white residue. If we accept the theory of physiology, which is a very reasonable theory, we are ready to admit that the bones found in these mounds are more or less burnt.

The work of excavation was not completed the first day on account of our time being quite limited; but a short time afterward Mr. Frank Oliphant, of Atchison, and the writer revisited the mounds and resumed the work. No relics of importance were found. In one of them was found a small flint arrow-head, and another worked flint, probably a war-club head. In the other was found a broken arrow-head and some chips of flint. The position of the bodies could not be correctly ascertained, as most of the bones had crumbled away, and what few remained were, it seems, scattered all around through the mounds. In one of them a piece of jaw-bone containing a few teeth was found in the southeast corner, and in the other a few fragments of charred skull were found in the east end. Although only a matter of conjecture, yet it is reasonable to suppose that human sacrifices had there been offered, and that after the body had been subjected to the action of fire without being entirely consumed, the remains were left in an irregular position and covered with earth and stones.

The mounds were walled with stone inside, and there was a layer of flat stones over the remains; also a circle of stone around the mound at the base. They were about twelv feet in diameter at the base, and about two feet in hight. They present a prehistoric appearance, although it can not be ascertained how old they are. They are similar in construction and contents to some mounds discovered near Fort Leavenworth in 1830, by Rev. Isaac McCoy, and it is probable that the Fort Leavenworth and Atchison county mounds were erected by the same aboriginal tribe.

Near the old camping-ground at Port Williams there is an Indian burying-ground where stone axes, arrow-heads, etc., hav been found. The writer visited this burying-place last spring and made some excavations, but turned up nothing more than some Indian bones. One of these bones is very interesting. It is a bone of the forearm, and it clearly shows that it had been broken at one time, and had mended again. The writer subsequently learned that exploration had been made in the same place about thirteen years previously, and that a tomahawk, an ax, and a large quantity of beads were unearthed. Many traces of a prehistoric race are in this section and I shall embrace every opportunity to examin them.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

A Child's Questions.

The average boy is a tireless truth seeker. He wants to know what a thing is and what caused it. The universe is a mystery to him, and he naturally believes it is the duty of his parents to explain it. So he thinks up questions while his papa is away at work, and when he sees him returning home in the evening he goes out to meet him to get his questions answered.

He asks the question with a good deal of sincerity and earnestness, and he feels hurt when he receives a playful or sarcastic answer.

Parents too often make the mistake of giving an untruthful, misleading, or witty answer, with the idea of getting off easily. Instead of trying to crush out the tendency to ask questions it is the parent's duty to teach his child to investigate and to inquire and find out first causes. Of course we must expect some puzzling questions—questions we cannot answer and that no scholar can answer—but let us answer what we can and keep on training the little folks to investigate.

I giv below a few of the curious yet pertinent questions that hav been asked me by our little boy before he was seven years old. Some of them are laughable, but he has never been laughed at for asking them. I giv them in his own language:

Who taught the first teacher in the world?

When people hav war do they kill little babies?

Why does soda water make hot wind come down your nose?

How can a ship sail against the wind?

What will they do for Christmas when Santa Claus dies?

Are there any shepherd dogs in Newfoundland?

Is a monkey part man?

How does Santa Claus get money to buy presents for so many children?

If every chicken in the world came out of an egg how did the first egg get laid?

Is it true that Christmas is God's birthday?

When a bird takes my string to build his nest don't you call that stealing?

How big is the biggest dog in the world?

Could anyone get a Newfoundland dog made over into a bulldog?

A NICE LETTER FROM A NICE BOY.

NEW YORK, Jan. 31, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My name is Yolande del Namhtrove, and I am going to school. I expect to be promoted, and I am almost eight years old, and I shall be in the third grade.

A lady who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER read some of the letters in the Children's Corner, and it made me think that I might write you, and if you print my letter I will write you again telling you of my experience in going to the Catholic Sunday-school, as I am a little Freethinker.

YOLANDE DEL NAMHTROVE.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., Jan. 30, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to you. This is my second letter to the Children's Corner. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. Mr. Paine, a wealthy man of Cambridge, got up an association giving prizes to children for going there. I went, and found out there was so much Christianity about it that I did not go any more.

My teacher has prayers every morning in school. Do the laws of Massachusetts compel me to attend them?

Well, I must close, as my letter is too long now. Your friend,

VIOLET ARCHIBALD.

[The law of Massachusetts declares that the Bible shall be read in the public schools, and attendance at school is compulsory.—ED. C. C.]

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to the Children's Corner, but my sister has—we lived in New York then.

New Rochelle is a very pretty place, and we hav lived here since March, 1891—nearly a year.

We do not know many people here, because we do not belong to any church. This town is a regular old Huguenot town.

I am in F grammar class; that means six from the highest class.

I am twelv years old. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for over seven years.

We expect to go to England in May, and stay till August, for papa is an Englishman.

Some of the girls here call me a heathen. I hope this letter is not too long.

I remain, Your friend,

PORTIA BROADBELT.

[A good letter. Write again. Portia's letters will be always welcome, and we shall be pleased to hear from her when she goes to England.—ED. C. C.]

A PLEASANT LETTER FROM A BRAVE LADY.

PINERCOOK, N. Y., Feb. 16, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all other Liberal works I can afford, including some of yours. Am an invalid confined to my home most of the time. I take great pleasure in reading our natural and sensible literature. I hav often wished I was able in health and purse to attend the gatherings and become personally acquainted with the workers. Living, as we do, in a place where there are no Liberal women, and married into a dyed-in-the-wool puritan family, excepting my husband, I hav felt sometimes that I had a hard "row to hoe," but hav managed to keep my row in sight. I am outspoken, but try to be kindly and Liberal.

In reading the Corner I am made quite happy living over the times when I could romp and play, and I hav written some of them down as I remembered them. This one I thought I would send.

Do as you please about printing, as I do not feel like the little folks about seeing "this in print." Sincerely thine,

ETTA MARDEN.

DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS OF THE CORNER: I feel when I read your letters like writing too. Although I am old now, I was once a little girl and full of play. They carry me back in one long dream of the past, and I roam around on the farm in my childhood home in the Green Mountain state. I visit again all my old playgrounds, and liv the times over again with my sister—younger, for I had three older sisters and no brother.

Our pets were a big watch-dog, Mage, and the kittens, little bossies, lambs, and pigs.

To-day I am thinking of the birds, how we watched their nest-building and rearing their young. When father would come in from his work to rest, he would tell us to be ready when he went back to go with him, for he had found another nest with such pretty brown eggs. So it was that we always had several of these bird homes to watch: and so gentle and careful were we not to frighten them that they soon would be quite at home with us. We watched them from day to day till it was a part of our play to visit them very often. Many were the bugs and worms we left near the nests, and ran away so they might come and get them.

How plainly I recall one summer when our birds were almost large enough to fly, there came a heavy shower just at night. How black and angry the clouds were! And then the rain came pouring down.

Father told us he was afraid our birds down by the pasture bars and those in the stump by the brook in the mowing-field would drown. How anxious we were! But we must wait till morning. So when it came, all sunny and bright, we ran out to see, and sure enough, there they were all cold and dead, and the parent birds hopping back and forth on the fence, weeping and calling so sadly that we wished we could tell them that we mourned too.

We finally decided to bury them, and were soon busy preparing for the sad event. We first found two boxes, and put cotton in them to make it soft, then laid the birdies in very tenderly. Then we gathered violets and ferns and placed around them, dug the graves side by side, and laid them in, and, after covering them, planted flowers around the little mounds. As I look back to it now, it was very like a Liberal funeral, no prayers or false ceremony, nothing but sunshine and nature, and ere many days the parent birds had ceased to moan. So had their little friends, Mat and Ett, who were busy with their other pets, that I should love to tell you about some other time.

ETTA MARDEN.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

"Boy, you hav tears in your eyes," he said to a little chap who was slipping along Woodward avenue. "Yes, sir." "Father dead?" "No, sir; last summer's dead and I'm awful cold."

Mother: "And if I tell you the story about the babe in the manger and the wise men from the East, Bobby, will you go to sleep?" Bobby (after studying for a moment): "No, ma, you tell me the story about Jack the Giant-Killer first, and then I'll go to sleep while you're telling about the babe in the manger."

How it is that we don't tumble off the earth as it moves around its axis, much troubled a little boy, having his first lessons in geography. "Still, if it can hold the sea on, it can hold us on," was his logical conclusion. The same small boy felt a keen injustice had been done him because his sister (several years his senior) had seen several places before he was born. He felt aggrieved and declaimed against the injustice in the following terms: "It was not my fault, I could not help being born last; and if you are older than me, I am newer than you," was his statement of the law of compensation.

News of the Week.

A BILL for the state regulation of vice is about to be introduced in the New York legislature. The society to oppose it is busy.

CATHOLICS in England are arousing to action in school elections, and in Carlisle hav returned Canon Waterton and Father Smith to their former places on the board.

THE pope has given audience to a member of the World's Fair committee. Leo will stimulate Catholic interest in the Fair, and especially commend the subject to the Holy Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. He promises to pray for Chicago.

IN Jackson county, Ia., the entire community about Iron Hill, or as it is called, "the New Jerusalem," has for some time been frantic over religion. Finally it is announced that a woman has given birth to a child who plainly is the second messiah. This is almost universally believed, and joy is unbounded.

THERE is dissension among Catholics as to whether education shall be discussed at the Catholic congress at Baltimore. It has arisen out of the desire of Archbishop Ireland that it shall not be. He is afraid of being censured for instituting the "Faribault system" in his province, which covers Minnesota. This system converted Catholic to public schools with state support, nuns in religious garb still teaching, but religious instruction being given not hourly but for an hour at the close of the day.

THE government of Mexico has so far been able to repress the Garza revolution without unusual effort. By its new railways it can concentrate troops and surround enemies at almost any point. Of its restriction of clerical power, which has made ecclesiastics espouse Garza's side, it is related: "The priests are not allowed to take an activ part in politics and to obstruct the development of liberal institutions and the advancement of education. They are kept under constant restraint, and while their sympathies are invariably excited whenever leaders like Garza attempt to harass and overthrow the national government, they are not able to influence the mass of the population."

REV. FATHER ADAMS, Roman Catholic, of 144 South 4th street, Brooklyn, N. Y., is drawing crowds of applicants for cure of disease. He prays, and then touches the patient with one of his eleven holy relics. He says: "My relics I believe are blessed of God. Five of them I got myself from the English convent of Bruges, four I got through Father Prendergast, the famous Jesuit priest, and the other two were given to me by grateful patients." He has raised a boy named Burns from his dying bed. He has cured one McCarthy who drew 162 breaths a minute, a boy named McGowan who had epilepsy, a Mrs. Fogarty suffering with cancer, and many others. A reporter who called found him taking the money of a crowd of poor people for his treatment of fits, cancer, sore eyes, felon, hip disease, etc.

THE new-made friendship between France and the Vatican is already about severed. The pope has commanded the French prelates to preserve amity with their government, but they are irrestrainably angry at the government prohibition of their visiting Rome. Radical members of the legislature propose separation of the church and the state. The present union of these institutions was projected with a view to keeping the church under control, but many think now that this can be done best in separation. A Catholic writer thus describes the wrongs which his church has suffered from the French republic: "The Jesuits and religious hav been hunted from the schools, the hospitals hav been turned over to lay nurses, watch has been set upon the actions of the bishops and their liberty curtailed, permission has been granted to apostate priests to marry and to perform marriage ceremonies, elementary education has been secularized, church pensions hav been in cases suppressed, soldiers hav been prohibited from attending mass, changes hav been introduced into the financial policy which will virtually ruin many religious institutions by the withdrawal of revenues to which they are entitled, laws hav been passed which tend to the destruction of the sacred character of marriage, the clergy hav been systematically excluded from beneficiary positions, religious teaching has been abolished from the schools, decrees passed for closing Catholic schools, and military service has been imposed upon young ecclesiastics—in fine, the state has practically assumed the form of organized Atheism and has pursued a policy that makes it necessary for Catholics to fight, with every means that the constitution affords, for a threatened faith."

ADDRESS THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

A Truth Seeker Aronnd the World. Four large volumes. With steel-plate engraving of the author in Vol. I, and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6 50.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. 1,075 pages, 8vo. Cloth, $3 00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church; Their Crimes and Persecutions. 8vo. 1,119 pages. Cloth, $3 00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5.00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8 00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price, $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brnssels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the Gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1 50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity between D. M. Bennett and Rev. G. H. Humphrey. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. Bennett and Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon Mr. Bennett. Price, cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 50 cts.

An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. 5 cts.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. Being 3,000 questions propounded to his Jewish Godship upon a great variety of subjects. Cloth, 75 cts.

Deacon Skidmore's Letters. First Deacon of Zion Hill Baptist church, giving many church incidents and his evolution from Christianity to Liberalism. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh: also the Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truthseekers. Cloth, $1.

The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers. 10 cents.

Open Letter to Samnel Colgate. 10 cents.
An Hour with the Devil. 10 cents.

Self-Contradictions of the Bible.

The Martyrdom of Man.

By WINWOOD READE.

PRESS NOTICE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill. . . . The boldest and, so far as historical argument goes, one of the ablest assaults ever made upon Christianity.—[Literary World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette place, N. Y.

Gems of Thought.

THE perpetual proffer of forgivness is a direct premium upon what Christians are pleased to call the commission of sin.—Ingersoll.

WHAT everybody echoes or in silence passes by as true to-day may turn out to be falsehood to-morrow, mere smoke of opinion, which some had trusted for a cloud that would sprinkle fertilizing rain on their fields.—Thoreau.

I PRESUME the inevitable quarreling and vituperativ abuse in which the bishops [at the council which selected the "inspired" books] mutually engaged against each other must hav rendered the taking of a vote impracticable, for Pappus, in his Synodicon, givs quite another version of the fixing of the canon at this Nicæan council. He tells us that the numerous and various books that laid claim to be canonical were all placed together under the communion table, and prayer was offered up that the books of divine origin might place themselvs on the table, while those of human origin should remain underneath—and it was so. In other words, to show their superiority to the rest, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, etc., jumped up on the table; so the great and distinguishing feature of the Holy Ghost as an author is that he writes books that can jump! Long may we, as individuals and as a nation, hav the judgment to ground our belief upon evidence so inexpugnable, and rest assured that the jumping Gospels are "the source of England's greatness!" —Saladin in God and His Book.

THE Christian partisan claims for Christianity the advantages of morality and civilization. With regard to civilization it may not be amiss to say a few words. Is it reasonable to expect from, or attribute to, a system which is founded upon ignorance the advocacy of enlightened views of humanity? Ignorance is the parent of religion; how then can the Christian religion be treated as an advocate of progress? At what period, in what country, and by whom as a representativ, did Christianity exhibit its flag of reform? By no one, at any time, can she claim this high prerogativ. It would be, in the church, an avowal of ignorance, an admission of error, to advocate reform. The very advocacy would carry with it the tacit acknowledgment of error or inefficiency; and it is a standing rule with the church, as old as the apostles, to discountenance innovation, and to quench it in blood if necessary. The grand feature of the church's influence upon society, and which has made it at times a conservativ engin, and at others a high-toned Tory. is its unvarying adherence to the custom of regarding the present as the ultimate point of reform. Whenever mankind hav retrograded, religion has followed them like a jackal; and to gratify the superstitious tendency of many old people, she has assumed as many, as hideous, and as grotesque forms as ever existed in the brain of a Cruikshank. Where man has advanced, the church, in common with the then existing institutions. submitted to reform, and became gradually civilized as the primitiv institutions crumbled away beneath the wand of mental progress.—Montgarnier.

PERHAPS the best-known development of this theological view in the Protestant church was that mainly evolved in England out of a French germ of theological thought—a belief in the efficacy of the royal touch in sundry diseases, especially epilepsy and scrofula, the latter being consequently known as the king's evil. This mode of cure began, so far as history throws light upon it, with Edward the Confessor in the eleventh century, and came down from reign to reign, passing from the Catholic saint to Protestant debauchees upon the English throne, with ever-increasing miraculous efficacy. Testimony to the reality of these cures is overwhelming. As a simple matter of fact, there are no miracles of healing in the history of the human race more thoroughly attested than those wrought by the touch of Henry VIII., Elizabeth, the Stuarts, and especially by that chosen vessel, Charles II. Though Elizabeth could not bring herself fully to believe in the reality of these cures, Dr. Tooker, the queen's chaplain, and later dean of Lichfield. testifies fully of his own knowledge to the cures wrought by her, though he confesses that she was somewhat skeptical. Yet it is especially instructiv to note that while in no other reign were so many persons touched for scrofula, and in none were so many cures vouched for, in no other reign did so many people die of that disease; the bills of mortality show this clearly, and the reason doubtless is the general substitution of supernatural for scientific means of cure. This is but one out of many examples showing the havoc which a scientific test always makes among miracles if men allow it to be applied.—Ex-President White of Cornell University.

A Physician's Sermon to Young Men. By Dr. W. Pratt. Price, 25 cents. Prof. R. A. Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy lads and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect; and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated.

Those of our friends who hav sent a dollar for the Bible Picture Book, as it is currently called, will hav received it ere this. It is one of the biggest books for a dollar that ever left any publisher's, and had the pictures been made expressly for it could not be afforded for several times the money. It is 7x9 inches superficial area, and an inch thick.

The text was prepared by a young man with a large capacity and a big pile of books. He crowded in enough facts to everlastingly condemn the sacred mythology of the Jews, and he was under strict orders, with dire penalties for disobedience, to ridicule the ridiculous wherever found. While the book, therefore, is absolutely accurate as to statements, the reader will obtain a different impression than he would by reading most other illustrated works on the same subject.

There is scarcely a call to say much of the pictures, except that this book is a splendid way of preserving what so many hav admired. The book has four hundred pages, half of them full-page pictures, averaging some eight to each of the following tales:

Adventures of Adam.
The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
Sustaining a Theory.
Some Giants.
The Adventures and Work of Noah.
A Hunting Anecdote.
Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
A Queer Family.
Isaac and His "Sister."
One of Twins.
Jacob and Esau.
Joseph the Man of Dreams.
Holy Moses.
Balaam the Diviner.
Bloody Joshua.
The Campaign of Deborah and Barak Against Jabin and Sisera.
General Gideon.
Jephthah and His Human Sacrifice.
Samson the Strong.
Ruth and Boaz.
Unstable as Water, God Shall Not Excel.
David, God's Favorit.
Some Stories from the Book of Kings.
Adventures of the Prophets.
Jonah the Truthful Sailor.

Besides the board-bound copies for one dollar, we hav bound some in cloth, with gilt-stamped sides, which sell for $1.50. Orders for either kind will be promptly filled.

The New Ingersollian Controversy.

The Telegram has saved its plates of the various controversial letters about Colonel Ingersoll's Christmas Sermon, and last Wednesday evening published them all together in a mammoth fourteen-page paper. The issue contains, among the more prominent of the articles, the Christmas Sermon, Colonel Ingersoll's reply to Dr. Buckley's criticism thereon, all of the Colonel's letters and his speech at the Unitarian dinner, as well as Dr. Buckley's Advocate editorial, and letters from the Paulist father Young and J. A. Lambert, the priest who once wrote Notes on Ingersoll. Besides, there are Telegram editorials and letters from various clergymen—Messrs. Dixon, De Costa, King, Peters, Talmage, a Jewish rabbi, and a heathen Chinee.

The edition sells for ten cents and may be ordered through this office.

The Ethan-Allen's-Daughter Story.

The marine tale that Ethan Allen told his daughter to choose the religion of her mother in preference to his, receives a setback rather embarrassing to the pious journalists and preachers who hav for so many years kept it in activ circulation, from two of their own number. Recently a subscriber wrote to the Christian Advocate asking if it were true. The editor replied that he hardly knew, but guessed not, as such apocryphal stories were common concerning noted men.

Another subscriber, Frank S. Townsend, of Greenpoint, L. I., now supplements the remark of the Advocate's editor by quoting from the "Curiosities of American Literature," published as an appendix to Disraeli's "Curiosities of Literature," and edited by Rufus W. Griswold, D.D., a minister of the Baptist church, though better known by his literary work, and a nativ of Vermont. Dr. Griswold repeats the story so often told of the daughter's death, and then says:

"This is a very pretty anecdote, but not a single sentence of it relates to any actual occurrence. The hero of Ticonderoga never lost a daughter during his own lifetime, and his wife was not a pious woman; at least, she pretended to hav experienced no religious influences. The falsity of the story, which has found its way into histories and into hundreds of printed collections of memorabilia, was asserted to us by the excellent daughter of the hardy chief, who yet survives, and who perhaps was the heroin of the tale."

The common way the story goes is that Colonel Allen on his deathbed requested his daughter to follow the religion of her mother. The denial by the daughter of course settles that, and the point weakly raised by Mr. Townsend, that as Colonel Allen was twice married one wife might hav been pious, is of no merit. Colonel Allen died in 1789; the above was written in 1843. "As a clergyman," says Mr. Townsend, "Dr. Griswold would be inclined to believe in the traditional story. As a Vermonter, he had opportunities to learn the truth." Mr. Townsend concludes: "It is therefore almost certain that the pathetic incident, so often used by hundreds of clergymen—including the present writer—must be considered as one of the many myths which in some way attach themselvs to every well-known man. Its use as a pulpit illustration would seem to be forbidden unless some one can overthrow Dr. Griswold's testimony."

Thus goes another Sunday-school story into oblivion. Without Voltaire or Paine or Allen as illustrious examples of deathbed repentance, what will the backwoods preacher do?

Why Are So Many Jail-Birds Christians?

Further interesting prison and asylum statistics are furnished the Passadena, Cal., Herald by E. Lewis, condensed from the report of the state board of prison directors for 1890. At the prison at San Quentin during that year there were received 1,392 prisoners. Of these 547 were regular attendants at church and 469 irregular attendants, making 1,016 good Christians shut up for various crimes. Almost the same number (1,015) also had the benefit of a Sunday-school education.

In the insane asylums at Agneus and Stockton there were received in the two years ending June 30, 1890, 1,101 males and 379 females. Alcohol destroyed the reason of 112 of these and religion demented 69.

Viewing these figures it seems tolerably clear that religion is not all that is claimed for it—at least in California. But as Mr. Lewis states, the figures are not peculiar to that state. He finds that the prison and asylum statistics of California correspond very closely to those of Iowa, Illinois, Kansas, and other states, and that alcohol is not the only enemy of the race, as he quotes from the seventeenth annual report of the board of commissioners of public charities of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for 1886, the following; "A study of the statistics of this prison will show that the prevalent impression that intemperance is the most fruitful cause of crime is erroneous. There are crimes such as burglary, forgery, and professional thievery, the practice of which is inconsistent with indulgence in strong drink, and it is well understood that if there were no such thing as drunkenness, such an institution as the eastern penitentiary would lose but few of its inmates." He also finds that according to the census office report there were in the penitentiaries of the United States in 1890, 45,233 criminals of all grades, from the sneak-thief to the defaulting cashier. In 1880 there were 35,538 convicts in the penitentiaries of the country, an increase in ten years of 9,695. And he thinks that when we take into consideration the statistical facts that less than one-third of the people of the United States are church-members, and that about three-fourths of the criminals in the penitentiaries are church-members, or church attendants, it presents a strange picture.

But just how and why these things are so we leave to the religious editors to figure out. No doubt they hav a satisfactory explanation, if they would only condescend to make it.

An Illustration in Marrying and Divorcing.

The supreme court of Massachusetts has declared that a mutual agreement marriage, when limited by the clause, "so long as mutual love shall exist," is not a legal marriage, and therefore requires no divorce proceedings to terminate the relation.

This decision has just been rendered in the case of Mrs. H. S. Lake, the noted Spiritualist speaker, who sought to separate from W. F. Peck, with whom she has lived for many years as his wife, by virtue of the following contract made in Portland, Ore., October, 1877:

"We, the undersigned, hereby enter into copartnership on the basis of the true marriage relation. Recognizing love as the only law which should govern the sexual relationship, we agree to continue the copartnership so long as mutual affection shall exist, and to dissolve when the union becomes disagreeable or undesirable to either party. We also agree that all property that shall be acquired by mutual help shall be equally divided on the dissolution of the copartnership. Should any children result from this union we pledge ourselvs to be mutually held and bound to provide them support whether the union continues or is dissolved."

Afterward they lived as husband and wife in Oregon for three months, in California for about a year, in New York for three months, and in Boston from 1886 up to the time when Mrs. Peck left her alleged husband. The full bench says in its opinion:

"There is nothing in the law of California, where the parties had their domicil, or in the law of Oregon, where the contract was signed, which recognizes an agreement to liv together 'so long as mutual affection shall exist,' as a marriage contract. We hav therefore no occasion to consider whether by the law of either of these states there can be a marriage by a mere contract without a ceremony."

Mr. Peck and Mrs. Lake will now probably sympathize with the views on marriage and divorce of the Wage-Workers' Political Alliance of the District of Columbia. At a meeting of that body recently a preamble and several amendments to the bill for the regulation of marriage and divorce in the District was drawn up. In the preamble was this direct sentence: "We want religious and legal scabs abolished by due process of law, whether they like it or not." One of the amendments directs that persons wishing to marry shall draw up and acknowledge before witnesses articles of marriage, which shall be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds for the sum of fifty cents, and divorce to be had for the same price. A husband and wife between whom a true consent of minds exists as to getting a divorce, may get one for fifty cents a head. Thus religious and legal scabs are left without employment, so far as marriage and divorce are concerned.

There is a good deal of puritanical humbug in the decision of the Massachusetts supreme court, and there is not a little sense in the recommendation of the Wage-Workers' Alliance. Mr. Peck and Mrs. Lake intended to get married. In marrying, the courts hav often held that the intention and living together, acknowledging publicly the relation, makes the union legal. The way the present case is muddled by the Massachusetts court makes the plan submitted by the Wage-Workers' Alliance appear extremely sensible.

The Literature Fund.

Some time ago we established a Literature Fund to be used in distributing Liberal literature. We hav found the fund extremely useful, having by its means been enabled to distribute anti-Sabbatarian works to the legislatures of North and South Dakota, Montana, Texas, Washington, and to Congress. Pamphlets on taxation of church property hav also been sent to New York's legislature, and some smaller lots where they would do good. By means of this fund we hav also been enabled to scatter thousands of the letters to Congressmen asking for Sunday opening of the World's Fair among people who would use them wisely.

From time to time our friends hav made additions to the fund, and we are thankful to acknowledge the following:

L. DeWitt Griswold	$1 00	A. V. Hendrick	5 00
John Nuessle	25	Silas Latham	5 00
T. R. Burrows	2 50	John D. Powers	5 00
John Souter	5 50	P. H. Rosenthal	25
J. C. Snodgrass	2 00	C. M. Powers	75
L. G. Reed	5 00	H. Merrich	1 00

We hav in the fund now $32.03 unexpended balance, but this will be used presently, as far as it will go, in opposing the Breckenridge Sunday bill for the District of Columbia, by sending anti-Sabbath literature to the members of the House of Representativs. We shall be glad to hav the fund increased at once that we may hav the means when any opportunity offers to further the cause of Liberalism and strike a blow for the enforcement of its political demands.

The Roman Catholic-Protestant row over the Minnesota schools culminated recently when Attorney-General Clapp gave the committee of Protestant ministers his decision that in order to prevent the parochial schools lately made part of the public school system from securing a part of the state school money, suits should be brought against the county auditors restraining them from apportioning any portion of the state fund in their hands to the schools which recently were parochial schools. Test suits will at once be brought against the auditors of Rice and Washington counties to prevent them from applying the state school money for the maintenance of parochial schools at Faribault and Stillwater.

This is from the Independent: "The New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, with Anthony Comstock for secretary, has been at work now for twenty years for the protection of twenty millions of children and youth. It is a proper thing that on the evening of March 1st, a great meeting should be held in Carnegie Music Hall in this city, in honor of the occasion, with addresses by Gen. Horace Porter, John Hall, D.D.; R. S. MacArthur, D.D.; J. M. Buckley, and the Rev. Walter Elliott of the Paulist Fathers. Anthony Comstock deserves the congratulations which he will receive." Gen. Horace Porter ought to be in better business than eulogizing Comstock. Of the others it is expected that they shall do miserable things, as it is their trade to support the false. Comstock is in himself only a man one itches to kick, but his backing by the church makes him dangerous.

We acknowledge the receipt of the following on one of Wanamaker's biggest postal cards:

"LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Feb. 21, 1892.

"MR. EDITOR: Having had ten years' experience as editor and publisher, I feel privileged to suggest to you the adoption of a new and much-needed rule in the conduct of your 'Friendly' department. It is this: Let brevity and not date, subject, friendship, blood, or caste decide priority. Let the copy be arranged on the hooks so that the shortest piece will always come off first. This is simple justice. THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot afford to be unjust. The person who boils a barrel of sap down into a gallon of syrup, who rewrites an article again and again and reduces it one-half every time, who at great labor winnows out the chaff of verbiage and inane thoughts and presents us the golden grain of well-digested ideas in fewest words, should hav something for his pains. Toil without recompense is death to effort and the grave of ambition. Prolixity is a newspaper evil—punish, discourage, and cure it. Brevity is a virtue—reward it.

S. R. SHEPHERD."

Colonel Ingersoll is a grandfather. The young Miss Brown, who constitutes his claim to that title, is four months old. She is a square-headed youngster with an investigating look in her eyes, and two of the colonel's encircling fingers are all the perpendicularity of her waist line permits. These and a few other things we gather from a photograph caught on the fly as the colonel held Miss Brown on his knee and tried to induce her to look at a flower, which she wouldn't do, but instead gazed steadily at him as though she wanted to know whether he would leave any skin on his Telegram critics or not. The picture is a delicate little revelation of Colonel Ingersoll at home, and Mr. Farrell did a good thing in having some printed for Mr. Ingersoll's friends. We can supply a few at fifty cents each. And we hope Miss Brown appreciates her great good luck in being born into that family.

The Liberals in Texas should remember Hon. George C. Pendleton kindly, even if he be a Methodist. At the last session of that state's legislature a bill was passed by the senate providing for a liberal amendment to the puritanic Sunday law of Texas. The bill was lost in the lower house, and so failed to become a law. In the senate there was a tie, and Mr. Pendleton, who is lieutenant-governor, gave the casting vote in its favor, for which act the Northwest Texas Conference of Methodist preachers adopted a paper censuring him in the following language: "We would here, now and forever, stamp this act unstatesmanlike and unpatriotic, deserving the condemnation of all good people." "Had the Methodists the power," comments Mr. J. S. Shaw, "he would be burned. But they havn't got it, and so they can only make mouths at him and call him 'unpatriotic.'"

The Rev. A. C. Dixon, of the Hanson place Baptist church, has gotten himself into deep, deep trouble. In a sermon called "Ingersollism as It Is," he alleged that: "A few years ago it was found that pictures and impure publications were passing through the mails. Anthony Comstock decided to stop it. On investigation, whom should he find representing publishers of impure literature but Colonel Ingersoll; paid to pollute the minds of the young of this generation!" Mr. Dixon was asked to take it back, but refused, quoting a great deal from Comstock's book to sustain him. He will now be sued. Colonel Ingersoll said to a Herald reporter the other day: "The Rev. Mr. A. C. Dixon made a charge against me. He was asked to retract and refused. I shall giv him an opportunity to prove his charge in court. I do not want to try the case in newspapers but before a judicial tribunal. The charge was specific and I do not feel like allowing it to pass unnoticed."

Frederick Millar, in the Agnostic Journal, writes of an opportunity not improved. "Any doubts," he says, "that may hav existed as to whether the head of the famous old Jewish firm had really retired from business and was dead are now set at rest by a circumstance of the most convincing kind, which occurred a few days ago within a stone's throw of the publishing office of this journal. Three of the most formidable and relentless of Jehovah's assailants—to wit, Saladin, G. W. Foote, and Charles Watts—were assembled around a table in the Farringdon street restaurant, partaking of tea. The Christian's stolen god never had a more glorious opportunity of vindicating his character for mercy, or of ridding himself and the Christian world of three such mighty foes. Here were the author of the most brilliant and scathing satires on the ancient firm, the editor of the Freethinker, whose pages are filled week by week with derision and ridicule of old 'I am that I am' and all his works, and one of the most skilled orators the anti-Christian party has ever had, sitting together under the same roof. Six square feet of that roof right down upon their heads would hav done the whole thing. Jehovah, thou art as dead and as helpless as thy son Jesus."

The man unconstitutionally hired to tell God what Congress ought to do seems to be making himself something of a nuisance by his officiousness and is in danger of having his oratorical efforts restricted, at the request of certain members who object to his "Congressional curtain lectures" instead of morning prayer. One of the members in the House remarked the other day that Dr. Milburn is "entirely too communicativ to the deity, and especially on the subject of Congressional deportment." He went on to say that the chaplain should confine himself to a general invocation in behalf of the Congress of the United States, without endeavoring to inform the Lord every morning what wayward Congressmen are doing, accompanied by suggestion what they should not do. Prior to Speaker Reed's administration his invocations had rather a personal flavor, and each morning there was a Congressional guessing match to determin the particular members he was addressing his remarks to. The speaker intimated to him one morning that his prayers were too "rich" for the average Congressman's blood, and he remodeled his prayer. But the best remedy for the notoriety-seeker is to remove him and thereby obey the United States Constitution.

Mrs. Besant's visits to this country hav not been without good effect, though no one would readily suspect who the beneficiaries are. It might be thought they are the members of the Theosophical Society, and that might be true, too, but the ones who were really and substantially benefited are a few of the poor and lowly and starving of the East side of this town. Mrs. Besant's labors for the poor of London are well known. She has always been the workingman's practical friend. And when over here she told the Theosophists that if they wanted to carry on the work of the "Masters" most acceptably they must seek out the suffering and help them. (When she was a Christian, this was to be done for Christ's sake; when an Atheist, for the sake of humanity.) Thereupon Mrs. Judge formed a society of Theosophical Workers, hired two rooms at Lewis and Third streets, one of the city's most poverty-stricken quarters, and opened a relief mission. For a few weeks the society has been giving free dinners, but to prevent imposture a charge of five or ten cents is now made. Once a week is held a "Mothers' Sewing Society," and twice a week a "Girls' Sewing Society." Evenings the rooms are transformed into a club for young men. How long the zeal of the Theosophical Workers will burn is a problem, and they labor under the disadvantage of lack of funds, as do most folks, but Mrs. Besant must hav the credit of instigating a good work, even if she did say a great many things of which she could know nothing.

Those who hav ordered the new Bible Picture Book and do not receive it by mail should inquire at their express office, as in many cases it is cheaper to send it by express. Of course, where there is an express delivery in town the book will be delivered as by mail.

COLONEL R. G. INGERSOLL

Will lecture at the

BROADWAY THEATER,

41st st. and Broadway, New York,

Sunday Evening, March 6th,

Subject: MYTH and MIRACLE.

On the Pacific Coast.

News and Notes.

We do strike shoals once in a while of a very disagreeable nature, and one of this sort was my experience at Los Angeles after traveling five hundred miles to deliver a lecture. The doors of the hall, which had been secured beforehand, were not opened, nor was the janitor anywhere to be seen, nor could he be found, and it was impossible to procure another hall.

A large number came and went away, and undoubtedly a fine audience would hav been present had it not been for this unfortunate "lock-out," which is not to be accounted for except as a "Christian trick." I hav an inkling that it was a kind of "popish plot," for the owner of the hall is a member of the holy Catholic church, and it may be this method was taken to defeat the Freethought lecture—not being able to use any argument except the "conspiracy of silence."

At any rate, whatever the reason, it was a scurvy piece of business, and from this time on the Liberals of Los Angeles will carefully avoid the new Opera Hall.

Another hall, it is hoped, will be found for lectures next Friday and Sunday evenings, and so according to the old proverb "a bad beginning will make a good ending."

However, I made the best of it; no use to fret. I went home with H. L. Shaug and family and had a jolly time, and never lost a wink of sleep.

To-day (Monday) is bright and beautiful, and so I hope for better things.

Our dear old friend John Riggin has passed away, over eighty years of age, and alas! over his remains there was a Christian service; and yet his heart revolted at the thought, as he oftentimes told me. He had selected those whom he wanted to giv the memorial address, but no notice was taken of his wishes. Over his cold body the church waved its banners of victory. But we will keep him in heart and memory, a gentle, noble spirit, for sixty years and more an outspoken Freethinker, generous in the support of his principles, a man of integrity, of bravery, respected by all, and with the record of a long, honorable, and successful business career. He died without fear and without regret, true to himself and to his cause. He wanted no god, no savior. He was simply John Riggin, self-reliant, kindly, hopeful. These were the last words he wrote: "Having no inclination to punish my enemies, no anxiety for the present, no vain regrets for the past, no fears for the future, I am in every respect ready for death, the inevitable end."

I hav been reading "Conduct as a Fine Art," published under the auspices of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., to which the American Secular Union privately contributed $1,000. I might as well state my opinion of this book and the action of the Union. I consider the whole scheme not only as beyond the function of the Union, but contrary to its fundamental principles.

It is in the direction of a union of church and state, the church in this case being the Unitarian church.

For private reading for Liberal schools supported by private funds—for the Liberal family—this is a very excellent book—like some portions of the Bible itself; but as a text-book for common schools it is not for a moment to be accepted.

To put such a book in the common schools would violate the right of every orthodox Christian. It would change the common schools into Unitarian Sunday-schools.

To teach morality per se in the common schools is contrary to the principles of Secularism. I object to it. The Christian says morality is based upon religion. I say it is based upon non-religion. We do not agree. Yet we both support the common schools. What then? We cannot teach morality any more than religion.

The function of the common school supported by the government cannot transcend the function of the government itself. The function of the government is not moral or religious, but police—that is, the maintenance of rights. The common school is simply a preventiv police measure; that is, it instructs in order to prevent crime. "It can only," as the American Sentinel says, "teach civility; that is, the Declaration of Independence."

If the common schools undertake to teach more morality than is in the Declaration of Independence it is a usurpation. The American Secular Union has committed itself to this usurpation. It has, under the administration of Dr. Westbrook, violated the very principles for which it was founded.

A donor of the $1,000 contribution to carry out this usurpation asks me to inquire why this gilt-edged, expensiv publication?—why was not this book published cheaply? If a document of the Union, it should be put in a popular form, say at twenty-five cents a copy. Now it is $1.50—beyond the reach of most of those who might desire to read it.

Why was $1,000 given to the authors for the book, and then the book handed back to the authors for them to publish and make what money they could out of it?

Had the donors of the $1,000 no rights in the book? Why was not even a copy of the gilt-edged book sent to the donors? But they must buy the book to find out the use to which their money had been put.

I do not question the motivs of Dr. Westbrook, but he does not seem to know what Secularism is.

If the book had been the right kind of a book, its method of publication is absolutely unjust and unwise. But the intent of the book as a text-book for common schools is altogether a violation of natural morality and the principles of a secular government.

To put this book into the common schools is as outrageous as to put the Bible in these schools. It is a purely sectarian book; it is not orthodox; it is not radical; it is not Freethought. It is simply Unitarian. It is altogether inadequate as my expression of morality because it teaches merely the outside of morality, its rules and regulations, and not the spirit of morality, or the basis of morality, which is the supreme matter. The orthodox do not want it; the Atheist does not want it. It is not deep enough or broad enough for either. It will do for the Unitarian, because the Unitarian stands neither for one thing or the other. Only the morality which the policeman can enforce with his club should be taught in the common schools. Morality in its deepest, highest sense is as private and personal as religion and must be taught by life, by poetry, by art, by experience, and by character, in the free, voluntary progress of man.

Horrible Figures.

Translated for The Truth Seeker by Gustave Nelson.

In a recent number of our Spanish contemporary, Las Dominicales, we discovered the following article, which very aptly was called Número Horribles (horrible figures):

"In the beginning of this century when Spain did not exult in the possession of passable highways, tramways, when it had no universities (in the proper sense of the word), no institutes, no normal schools, scarcely any wealth, had no means of conveying knowledge, and was but sparsely populated—at that time there existed a formidable army of priests and sacristans, friars and nuns, and all species of vagabond clergymen classified according to different regiments and companies, presented for consideration as follows:

"Diocese priests	16,689	vergers, precentors, chorus-singers, musicians, cantata-singers, and dancers	20,000

"Which number represents a tenth part of the population, that is to say, every hundred Spanish boys and grandees had to support ten loafers of some kind or another—ten parasites who lived by prayers and the practice of all kinds of more or less mysterious knavery.

"The number of these parasites has not decreased since that time, nor has the cost of their keeping. At the present time the annual income of this black army with members of which the whole world is cursed, is appalling. And yet where is the beneficent influence of the clergy to be found? Our country is overrun with highwaymen; wherever we turn we find thefts, quarrels, stabbing affrays, prostitution, and begging. Priests are found to partake in all these unlawful affairs, and besides they beg for the Lord our God, from whose tender care and loving meekness we pray to be delivered, as effectually as the priests deliver us of our reals.

My Lecture Trip.

From Shreve I proceeded on my journey to Massillon, a town tolerably well known to Freethought lecturers. I soon discovered a good Liberal friend in W. S. Moke, whose guest I remained while in this town. Massillon has a population somewhere about ten thousand, and it is well known as an exceedingly Liberal town. Upon my arrival the ground was covered with a mantle of crisp white snow, to the depth of several inches, which presented excellent conditions for sleighing, and as a natural consequence the streets were fairly alive with sleighing parties. The jingle of the bells could be heard on every side, while the hills literally swarmed with small boys and their bob-sleds. Everyone seemed to enjoy the severe cold weather, but I found that it caused a depreciation in my audiences. Although my lectures had been well advertised, my first audience was certainly a small one. Nevertheless I was fully compensated by the large one I had at my second lecture.

The local daily Independent published a very fair report of my lectures, together with a mild criticism from a correspondent. To this I immediately penned a reply, which the editor very generously published, and although there was nothing therein that could hurt the feelings of even the most bigoted Christian, still my critic saw fit to again rush into print with a column or so of the most vituperativ abuse that ever issued forth from the pen of man, which caused me to again enter the mental arena and go for my Christian antagonist. This time, instead of answering my arguments, the editor prefaced my article with a few lines from my opponent, which he was pleased to call an answer, at the same time claiming that there was nothing in it to call for one, which I certainly thought was a cheap way of shuffling out of the difficulty. I must certainly thank my friends in Massillon for the kind interest they manifested in my behalf. The extreme kindness shown toward me by Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Moke during my stay in their pleasant home will ever endear them to my memory. I met here many good Liberal workers, and among them some of the best and truest friends in our ranks, such, for instance, as Solomon Hunt, one of Massillon's most respected and honored citizens; his son, Joseph Hunt, and family; Mr. Lowe; Mr. Skinner, and several others whose names I cannot now recall.

On again the next day I went to old Alliance, where a lecture had been arranged for me by R. G. Smith. I arrived here in the afternoon, and at the time of my arrival a severe snowstorm set in, and continued through the rest of the day and the earlier portion of the evening; this, of course, seriously affected my audience, but, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, I was favored with a larger attendance than I had anticipated, the hall being considerably more than half full. A short, though somewhat lively, discussion followed the lecture, which gave an additional interest to the meeting. There are many Freethinkers in this town, which is, perhaps, one of the oldest in the state of Ohio. Several ladies had manifested courage sufficient to face the storm and make their way under such difficulties to the hall in order to hear my lecture. I could only stay one day, so, taking a hurried leave of my friends in Alliance, I started again next morning for Canal Dover. Arriving here, I made my way upon advices previously received to the Iron City House, where I was visited by Mr. S. Toomey, an old but well-known Freethinker. The lecture had been arranged by him, and, thanks to his zealous labors, a good and select audience greeted me when I entered the room, and that, too, despite the activ opposition of the clerical party, and the extreme cold weather which kept the mercury somewhere about 16° below zero. There were quite a number of ladies present, also the postmaster, and several of the city officials, all of whom seemed to thoroughly enjoy the lecture, and exhibited their appreciation of the sentiments uttered. There was present also a representativ of the local press, who took copious notes of the address, and succeeded in securing the publication of a very complimentary notice and a fair report of the meeting. The attitude of the press in this respect is, to-day, worthy of notice, for it is but a few years since that we could not get a notice of our lectures inserted in any of our dailies or weeklies, not even as paid matter, but now I notice that, in many instances, they are eager to obtain our notices, and in some cases they will even run after it themselvs. Truly, there is a vast difference in this respect, comparing things as they were then and as they are now. Is not this a sure and significant sign of the progress made in Secular ideas? It certainly shows the tendency of the present age. I did not meet with many friends here personally, but there is quite a large number of Freethinkers in this little place. It is in the main a German settlement, and as the Germans are noted for their extreme Liberal views, this will probably account for the reason why Canal Dover is so tainted with heterodoxy. I could not stay here very long, so I again resumed my journey, this time to Kent, where I was down for two lectures. The first friend I met with here was L. G. Reed, a radical thinker, and an earnest worker for our cause. A home was found for me with Freethought friends at the house of Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Doncaster, who did their utmost to make my stay in Kent as pleasant as possible, and for which I accord to them my sincere and heartfelt thanks.

For the first time in my life I hav, to be honest, to report a failure at my lectures—a fact I deeply regret being compelled to admit. At my first lecture on Sunday afternoon, there were scarcely forty people present, and these looked considerably fewer, as the lectures were given in the Opera House, making the few people present look almost lost. In the evening there were fewer still, so that in no way can I say that the lectures were a success. But right here let me ask, What is the cause of this? To my mind there appears to be too much timidity exhibited in the attempt to spread Freethought principles in Kent, too much fear lest we should over-excite the delicate feelings of our Christian friends. Remember this policy has brought disaster and ruin to our national organization, and to apply the same to local societies means the same results to them. There is also too much complacency of spirit, or a dread of being regarded as an Infidel. In the first place, the society is called "The Portage County Science Institute," a name having no direct significance in itself, and utterly incapable of exciting interest in the minds of the people. Besides, when the people know that you are Freethinkers in the ordinary sense of the word, and that you are interested in the propagation of Freethought ideas, they cannot fail to realize your want of courage and the timidity displayed, consequently they are incapable of admiration for your purposes or appreciation of your methods.

Again, what is there to be ashamed of in the title of a lecture called the "Philosophy of Secularism?" In my opinion there is nothing. Yet, even this had been changed to "The Science of Human Cultivation." It is no answer to say that the ordinary mind could not grasp the meaning of the former, for it is decidedly more easy of comprehension than the latter, and is not one-half so explicit, and does not convey near so much to the minds of the people. Again, even my name had been perverted into Professor Charlesworth, which was decidedly wrong, because I am not a professor, and I hav no right to such a title until I hav earned it.

It may be that the idea givs an air of greater importance to the occasion, but the public will see through it, therefore it is far better to say deliberately what you mean and what your intentions are. Do not seek to cover your true intentions with the false gloss of honeyed phrases, for such proceedings can only excite the suspicions of the indifferent public, and are likely to breed contempt and secret derision. Tell the people in plain, clear, and forcible language just what you mean to do, and how you intend to do it. Be frank, be honest, be open, be free. Frankness will secure for you the confidence of your friends and foes alike. Honesty will win for you their respect. To be open will cause others to be open with you. And to be free will enable you to make mutual exchanges, and to enjoy the liberties and prize the benefits you hav won. I trust that our friends in Kent will pardon me for thus giving vent to my opinions concerning the meetings in January last. I hav but followed here the same advice that I hav given to them. I trust that they will not take any offense at my criticism, and I do hope for better success should I ever visit them again. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Proposed Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The secretary of the American Secular Union calls attention to the fact that "sectarian institutions in Illinois yet receive support from the public treasury. The Union for lack of finances was unable to secure the necessary injunction to prevent this infamous robbery of the people. It is the intention of the present board to enter its protest against a further dishonest disbursement of the public funds."

There is not a state, scarce a town or city, in the Union that does not every year perpetrate similar outrages on the people.

Congress during the past six years has appropriated to Roman Catholic schools $1,586,465 of the people's money.

During the past year (1891) Congress appropriated for religious schools $554,558, of which the holy Roman Catholic church received $347,689, and every state, town, and municipality has suffered robbery of its treasury for the same wrongful purpose.

It is well known that the bishops hold in trust for the Roman Catholic church the most valuable properties in all our large towns and cities, which in nearly every state are exempt from taxation. Not satisfied with this indirect robbery, they are reaching their avaricious hands into the pockets of the people and taking all they can bribe legislatures and councils to appropriate, under promis of, or threat to cast against them, the votes of the members of the church.

And Protestants never miss an opportunity to follow the example of the Catholics just as far as they can; they are just as anxious to practice the same extortion or stealing.

In answer to the urgent appeal to Senator Squire by the secretary of the Washington Secular Union the following reply has just been received:

UNITED STATES SENATE, WASHINGTON, D.C., Feb. 1, 1892.

C. B. REYNOLDS, ESQ., Secretary Washington Secular Union, Fremont, Wash., Dear Sir: In reply to your letter of the 25th, would say that in so far as I am able to judge now I will be in favor of the Amendment which you quote in your letter. Very truly,

WATSON C. SQUIRE.

I hav written to Senator Allen, and to Representativ Wilson; it is not time yet to hav received their replies. I hav sent out a number of blank letters to our vice-presidents east of the Cascades. I am hopeful of obtaining promises from Allen and Wilson to use their vote and influence in favor of the Amendment.

If the American Secular Union would supply printed letters to the members of the House and Senate at Washington, D. C. (with blanks for names), making urgent appeal for their vote and influence in favor of the Amendment, and furnish the activ workers in the Liberal ranks with such letters, requesting them to fill in blanks with names of their representativs and senators, sign and mail such letters, and then induce their friends and neighbors to do likewise; supplying them with the printed letters of the American Secular Union for that purpose, the result would be twofold; it would impress every member of the national legislature with the numerical strength and influence of the American Secular Union, and so insure its future requests being treated with respect and consideration; and would beyond doubt result in the passage and adoption of the proposed Amendment.

Is not this "a consummation devoutly to be prayed for?" Would it not be a grand stride toward the entire divorce of church and state?

It would not cost a tithing of the amount needed to fee Judge Nelson, and pay the costs of carrying a case through the Illinois courts, which at best—if gained—would only be of advantage to that one state, and there would be the liability of the case being tried by some fanatical, self-conceited blatherskite like Judge Hammond of Tennessee who would, as in the King case, pervert the facts, and in defiance of law and reason render an adverse decision.

As to the board of the American Secular Union "protesting," what will that avail? They might as well wink or whistle. Why not adopt some practical course to secure the adoption of the proposed Amendment, and thus prevent any future "appropriation of public money or property to any religious society, religious denomination, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control?"

While we cannot but admire the charming euphuism of the talented and erudite secretary of the American Secular Union, I venture most humbly and respectfully to suggest, that in view of the activity and persistent zeal of the enemy, we can hardly afford to wait until 1893 to "proudly fling our banners to the breeze," however astonishingly magnificent such a "fling" might prove. I am skeptical of legislation in favor of the Nine Demands ever being secured by such "beating the air," even with our banner inscribed with great names.

Maryland has fought a very hard fight, gained a well-deserved victory. What help in that battle did the American Secular Union afford?

There is now waging in Pennsylvania a fierce battle over Sunday laws. What assistance are the Liberals of Pittsburgh—who hav always been liberal contributors to its funds—receiving from the American Secular Union?

A recital of actual services rendered by the American Secular Union, a plain statement of plan of practical work now being actually performed—would arouse enthusiasm, rally all Liberals to its support, and insure immediate generous contributions to its funds.

While waiting for this let every Liberal realize the necessity of individual action, and do all possible to secure the passage of the proposed Amendment to the federal Constitution, and urge all friends and acquaintances to do likewise.

C. B. REYNOLDS.
Sec. Wash. Secular Union.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Your excellent journal was a novelty here and met with a warm approval. It differs in so many respects from our own Freethought papers that criticism was the natural result. Heston's pictures are generally liked by those Freethinkers who come across them, and I could only wish that England was better supplied with copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Unfortunately for us all, there is a very great dislike for Antichristian journalism—dislike, that is, from the news-agent's point of view. That the public would readily buy, if the papers were properly exhibited in the shop-windows, I firmly believe. On the other hand, the news-vendors giv the all-enduring British public unnecessary trouble and annoyance. When living in London, I was fixed between two news-agents, each of whom was a quarter of a mile distant in exactly opposit directions. One sold the Freethinker, the other the National Reformer; neither sold both. As the Freethinker seller was a poor struggling woman, and knowing the limited sale of the four-cent Reformer, I usually gave her my custom for Mr. Foote's print; but the other dealer had a sound connection, and only declined to sell the largely circulated Freethinker out of prejudice; so I got my Reformer elsewhere, though I continued to send lots of others to ask for the tabooed print. At length they decided to sell both the journals, and will profit by the decision. Last week, when passing by the shop, I saw a copy of the Freethinker boldly exposed on the outside of the shop in the very center of the window; and the little sheet was receiving more attention from passers-by than any other exhibit. Two or three at a time were craning their necks to read the leading article. All that leads me to think that your TRUTH SEEKER might find a ready welcome were it better known here, the only thing against it being the price, necessarily increased by transit, and its very irregular delivery.

Celestine Edwards, a negro preacher, has come to raise religion and the wind in Manchester. From first to last he has met with unexpected opposition from the Freethinkers here, and has greatly incensed the Christians by his ignorance of theology. That he is a fluent, witty speaker goes without saying; most negro stump orators are; but he is as unscrupulous as he is humorous. When his lying sarcasms are applied to Secularists only, the Christians beam with good humor and excitement; but when he turns the same weapons upon his Christian admirers, they incline to the opinion that they hav been entertaining a devil unawares, and wish him at Jericho. Nor is that wish modified when they find unpracticed or incipient Freethought speakers are able to confute him all along the line.

One good effect of his lecturing is that the theologians hav been stirred up as they hav not been stirred up for a generation. Secularism has received a tremendous lift; and the weak points of Christianity are being discussed by the weak-kneed of every school. It has already resulted in my being asked to explain Secularism in a lecture to a body of Spiritualists here, and a further invitation to address a Sunday afternoon men's class on the same subject at the Bible Christian church school in Salford. In Sheffield, where Celestine Edwards has been holding forth, Charles Watts has been invited to expose his fallacies; and with such success has he done so that the Christians are beside themselvs with rage that they ever had the ebony evangelist to play Balaam to their asses.

I suppose that it may be taken as a fair proof of the quality of our rising lecturers that one of them, Mr. Heaford, has translated into English a most useful French book by M. Naquet, entitled "Collectivism, and the Socialism of the Liberal School," a criticism and an exposition. The old taunt of uneducated lecturers is fast becoming a thing of antiquity. Our younger lecturers quite realize the necessity of something more than merely rudimentary knowledge; and if they are unable to add university degrees after their names, it is often because they hav directed that attention which would hav to be given to certain subjects in order to pass the prescribed examinations to those subjects which are infinitly more essential to Freethought propaganda. Algebra and Euclid are much less important to us than mythology, history, and the social questions of the hour; while no amount of study given to the last subject would bring a man an academic title. None the less the knowledge concurrently acquired by our own students is far from inconsiderable; and Mr. Heaford's contribution to literature is very welcome. In explanation of his choice he says: "Though a convinced Socialist myself, I confess that M. Naquet's book struck me as a most concise and valuable contribution to the discussion of the social question. I felt that the scientific tone in which M. Naquet attempts the confutation of collectivism deserves full consideration at the hands of English Socialists and of all those interested in the topics with which the book treats."

The unfortunate squabble over the Bradlaugh Memorial Hall continues and bids fair to alienate some few of those whose admiration of Mr. Bradlaugh was unlimited; by which I do not mean that those of us who cannot see eye to eye with them undervalue our old leader or love his memory the less. The trouble is that the dissentients are adopting a species of hero-worship, totally forgetting that inasmuch as Bradlaugh's striking quality in life was to subject himself and all else for the good of the cause he had in hand, so after death the best method of perpetuating his memory is to extend that work rather than to exhaust our resources on so gigantic a white elephant as these good but unpractical people fondly contemplate. Throughout the dispute Mr. G. W. Foote has worked with commendable tact, and has won golden opinions even from those who were at first opposed to his ideas.

Just now, besides endeavoring to organize Lancashire into a Freethought federation, I am trying to collect the scattering Secularists in the army and navy. Of course it is impossible to hav branches of the National Secular Society in regiments or on board men-of-war; but my idea is to get two men, retired representativs of each branch of the service, who will be willing to keep themselvs posted up in the movements of ships and battalions and who will be centers of information and correspondence with the scattered units. Such a scheme is feasible enough, but it does take such a tremendous time to arouse any sort of enthusiasm in people's breasts. One encouraging letter from an Irish soldier assures me that I am on the right road in this matter; but much more is needed before one dare take any decisiv steps in the matter. Possibly some of your American Secularists might be able to enlighten us as to the condition of Freethought in your army and navy, and the methods used, if any, to keep Freethinkers thus employed in touch with each other and with some common center.

The deaths of the duke of Clarence, Cardinal Manning, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, and other great folks hav caused a very considerable shuffling of the cards in England. The duke's death was a matter of dynastic importance only, but Manning's loss must be a crippling blow to Roman Catholicism here. An Oxford man and a dignitary of the Church of England, Rome made an unquestionably valuable catch in converting him to the ancient faith; and that social charm which hangs round the connection with the older universities was instrumental in attracting those to Ultramontanism who would scarcely hav associated with a non-university man. Our local bishop of Salford, which adjoins Manchester and is virtually a part of it, is spoken of as Manning's successor at Westminster. Gladstone is wondering why Manning's death is thought so much more about than Newman's, and Oxford is greatly disturbed because it is proposed to erect a statue to the last-named recreant in an important position in that city. Spurgeon represents a decaying school of Calvinistic theology, and whilst his crude views are generally denounced his unswerving fidelity has been ungrudgingly recognized by all schools. He was one of the few who to-day "liv by faith," and the exception has proved the rule, with unwelcome force to the Christians, that skepticism and unbelief are making havoc amongst the teachers of religion.

Yours fraternally,
SAM STANDRING.

Another Letter from Mr. Heywood.

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: If, as the Bible says, "God is love," he is the old boy Cupid, who "always finds us young and always keeps us so." In the classic story of Æneas and Dido, the poet Virgil—per Dryden—speaking of the goods which the founder of Rome had sent with the bewitching boy to the Tyrian queen, says:

But, far above the rest, the royal dame—
Already doomed to love's disastrous flame—
With eyes insatiate and tumultuous joy
Beholds the presents and admires the boy.
The guileful god about the hero long,
With children's play and false embraces, hung;
Then sought the queen; she took him in her arms
With greedy pleasure and devoured his charms.
Unhappy Dido little thought what guest,
How dire a god, she drew so near her breast.
But he, not mindless of his mother's prayer,
Works in the pliant bosom of the fair,
And molds her heart anew, and blasts her former care.
The dead is to the living love resigned,
And all Æneas enters in her mind.

By the connivance of Juno and Venus, who—since Troy, from Helen's love of Paris, was a "lost cause"—were bound to get Æneas away from Tyria and Carthage and start Rome, there was a hunting party in the woods, a black thunder-storm, a cave to flee to, and a "nuptial bed" arranged. But the news got out, and, whew! trial by Rumor resulted.

Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows—
Swift from the first, and every moment brings
New vigor to her flight, new pinions to her wings.
Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size,
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies.
Enraged against the gods, revengeful earth
Produced her, last of the Titanian birth.
Swift is her walk, more swift her winged haste—
A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast.
As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
So many piercing eyes enlarge her sight;
Millions of opening mouths to Fame belong,
And every mouth is furnished with a tongue,
And round with listening ears the flying plague is hung.
She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes;
By day from lofty towers her head she shews,
And spreads through trembling crowds disastrous news;
With court informers haunts and royal spies;
Things done relates; not done she feigns; and mingles truth with lies.
Talk is her business, and her chief delight
To tell of prodigies and cause affright.

How they did talk about that Brooklyn scandal! The Carthage Tribune, the Tyrian Times, the Athens Herald, the Sparta World—all the "great daily" guns were loaded to the lips with the "spicy news" of the "great trial." But then as now the man "skips," and leaves the woman to suffer the costs of it.

What course, alas! remains, to steer between
The offended lover and the powerful queen?
This way and that he turns his anxious mind,
And all expedients tries and none can find.
Love the first motions of the lover hears,
Quick to presage, and e'en in safety fears.

Alarmed, the ravished queen pleads:

Had you deferred at last your hasty flight,
And left behind some pledge of our delight,
Some babe to bless the mother's mournful light,
Some young Æneas to supply your place,
I should not then complain to liv bereft
Of all my husband, or wholly left.
Now, by those holy vows so late begun,
By this right hand (since I hav nothing more
To challenge, but the faith you gave before),
I beg you by these tears too truly shed,
By the new pleasure of our nuptial bed;
If ever Dido, when you most were kind,
Were pleasing in your eyes or touched your mind,
By these my prayers, if prayers may yet hav place,
Pity the fortune of a falling race!
For you I hav provoked a tyrant's haste,
Incensed the Libyan, the Tyrian state;
For you, alone, suffer in my fame,
Bereft of honor and exposed to shame!

But it was no use; Juno and Jove, Æneas and his satiated crew, heaven and earth, were "agin" the "abandoned," "fallen" woman; Dido suicided, plunged into the flames of her burning palace; Æneas found another "love," became king; Romulus and Remus mothered by a she-wolf, the escape of the Sabine women, Cæsar, Cicero, a prolific breed of popes and the world-wide nightmare of "Catholic" tyrannism, result. There are many passages in Virgil's "Æneid" and his "Georgics" that it would not be safe for any reformer to mail. In "Horace," Smart's translation (T. A. Buckley, editor; Harper Brothers, publishers); in Byron's "Don Juan," Shakspere's "Venus and Adonis," "Passionate Pilgrim," "Lover's Complaint;" in Sir Philip Sidney's "Astrophel and Stella;" in Appleton's Cyclopedia, Vol. I, p. 512; in Bayard Taylor's "China, India, and Japan" (Geo. P. Putnam & Sons, publishers) pp. 52 and 247—language far, far more indictable than anything in "Ancient Sex Worship;" and beyond all in the Bible (see D. M. Bennett's "Where Obscenity Is"); Garden of Eden, a sex allegory, and "forbidden fruit;" sex intercourse; Solomon's Song, voluptuous all through; David murdering a man in order to "know" his wife, Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, who had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines and yet is Wanamaker's "the wisest man," is God's plain English for which they "socked" two years' imprisonment on me. And tons and tons of books from the Bible House, Putnam's, and Harper's should be burnt as "obscene" in Union square, if Foster's and Carpenter's rulings in Harman's and my cases are correct, and if that Comstock annex, the Republican party, Wanamaker, Hoar, Harrison & Co., rightly hold me caged here. "If Mr. Heywood is justly imprisoned the Bible is the first book that should be suppressed under the statue," said Judge Loring. "I defy Congress to enact a law to exclude any alleged obscene literature from the mails that will not first exclude the Bible," said Elizur Wright. For suppressing reform newspapers and imprisoning editors, for sanctioning, instigating indeed, lewd, rude, savagely irresponsible censorship of the press and denying freedom of conscience, the Republican party must answer in the coming presidential campaign. In deference to Cupid I should say that I mean no disrespect to him, in seemingly allying him with a mere theologic opinion called God. Love as a human fact is far superior to anything alleged "divine revelation" can show.

Misrepresentation of Our Best Co-Workers.

Mrs. M. A. Freeman, of Chicago, Ill., claiming to be "corresponding secretary American Secular Union," in a letter to the members of the defunct American Secular Union published in the Investigator of December 2d, indulges in most uncalled-for aspersions of the Seventh Day Adventists.

The "corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union" writes: "The American Secular Union invites all who will support its Nine Demands to affiliate with it. This is all that, as a political organization, it can consistently require; but we, as Freethinkers, cannot forget that were it not for superstition we would not hav been forced to formulate those demands, and that while superstition remains, its hand will ever be reached forth to suppress Freethought, to strangle free speech. Said one to a prominent Adventist, who was working against the Sunday law: 'But if it were the observance of the old Jewish Sabbath that was to be enforced—what then?' 'Then,' he said, 'I should feel compelled to work for its enforcement.'"

This is a gross perversion of truth. Every prominent Seventh Day Adventist working against the Sunday law is thoroughly posted upon the subject. It would therefore be utterly impossible for such a one to hav made any such reply; the connecting paragraphs giv evidence that this unprovoked attack upon our most efficient and influential co-workers was not a simple mistake, but is as spitefully malicious as it is untruthful.

The Seventh Day Adventists are without exception opponents of any union between church and state, and earnest, persistent workers for civil and religious liberty.

Their National Religious Liberty Association is a very large and powerful organization with offices in New York city, Washington, D. C., Chicago, Ill., Oakland, Cal., and Battle Creek, Mich. Its mottoes are "Equal and exact justice to all," "Keep the state and church forever separate." Among its published and avowed principles I find: "We believe it is the right, and should be the privilege, of every man to worship according to the dictation of his own conscience," and "We deny the right of any civil government to legislate on religious questions."

Its organ is the American Sentinel, a most fearless, able, and consistent opponent of Sunday laws, religious exercises in our public schools, and the exemption of church property from taxation.

The Seventh Day Adventists hav written, printed, and distributed more pages of literature advocating the abolition of all Sunday laws, and giving the facts and arguments in favor of the entire and complete divorce of church and state, in any one week during the past three years than the American Secular Union and all its auxiliaries hav ever distributed from the day of its first inception up to the present hour.

So far from suppressing free thought or strangling free speech, the Seventh Day Adventists are honest, zealous defenders of free speech. Their leading ministers hav attended our conventions and from our Infidel rostrum most loudly and eloquently advocated and defended the justice of the Nine Demands.

The Seventh Day Adventists hav a record upon the Sabbath and Sunday observance question that is plain and unmistakable. Their position is a matter of public and national record—the record of the Senate of the United States (see 50th Congress, Second Session, Message and Document No. 43, pages 85–102).

On Dec. 13, 1888, the United States Senate committee on education and labor held a hearing upon the bill for a national Sunday law introduced by Senator Blair, who was chairman of that committee. At that hearing the Seventh Day Adventists were officially represented by their honored and accredited exponent, Alonzo T. Jones, editor of the American Sentinel. Before that committee this very point was brought out clearly and distinctly, over and over again. I giv a brief quotation:

Senator Blair: "Would it answer your objection in that regard if instead of saying 'the Lord's day' we should say 'Sunday?'"

Mr. Jones: "No, sir. If the bill was framed in behalf of the real Sabbath of the Lord, the seventh day, the day which we observe—if this bill proposed to promote its observance, or to compel men to do no work upon that day, we would oppose it just as strongly as we oppose it now."

Senator Blair: "You oppose all Sunday laws of the country, then?"

Mr. Jones: "Yes, sir."

Senator Blair: "You are against all Sunday laws?"

Mr. Jones: "Yes, sir. We are against every Sunday law that was ever made in this world, from the first enacted by Constantine to this one now proposed; and we would be equally against a Sabbath law if it were proposed; for that would be Antichristian, too." (And this is the constantly avowed position of every one of their papers, publications, and ministers, and heartily indorsed by every Seventh Day Adventist in good standing.)

This whole argument of Elder Jones's was published in pamphlet form, and thousands of copies hav been distributed.

Nor is this the only record on the subject. On Feb. 18, 1890, the House committee on District of Columbia held a hearing on a Sunday bill introduced by Hon. W. C. P. Breckinridge. The Seventh Day Adventists were heard before this committee. I quote from the verbatim report of the speeches:

The Chairman: "We desire to know in whose behalf you appear."

Mr. Corliss: "I speak in behalf of the Seventh Day Adventist church at Washington of which I am pastor. I appear not, as has been affirmed, before you to speak in behalf of a Saturday Sabbath. Far from it, gentlemen of the committee. If this bill, No. 854, were to hav incorporated into it instead of 'Sunday,' or the first day of the week, the word 'Saturday,' or the seventh day of the week, there is no one who would oppose it stronger than I."

Mr. Jones: . . . "Congress can make no law upon the subject of religion without interfering with the free exercise thereof, therefore the Seventh Day Adventists, while observing Saturday, would most strenuously oppose any legislation proposing to enforce the observance of that day. Gentlemen, it is time for all the people to declare as the Seventh Day Adventists decidedly do, that this nation is, and of right ought to be, free and independent of all ecclesiastical or religious influence, connection, or control."

In the case of "State of Tennessee vs. King," Judge Hammond in his decision of the case made false statements akin to those of the corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union. A full refutation was published in the American Sentinel of November 19th, giving copy of letter from Mr. Jones to Elder O. A. Olson, president of the general conference (the highest office in the Seventh Day Adventist ranks).

Mr. Jones quoted the statement made by the judge, that "His [King's] own religious feeling or fanaticism [is] that the seventh day of the week, instead of the first, should be set apart for the day of public rest and religious practices. That is what he really believes and wishes, he and his sect; and not that each individual shall select his own day of public rest and his own day of labor." And asked, "Is this true?"

Elder Olsen replied: "I hav been personally connected with the Seventh Day Adventist denomination for more than thirty years, and I can freely say that no such belief or wish is entertained by this people. Our belief and wish is directly the opposit of that stated by the judge."

There is no excuse for an avowed exponent of Secularism being ignorant of these well-known facts.

The corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union has placed herself in the unenviable predicament of having in her first official publication made statements which are not only utterly unfounded, but which public and official records show to be untrue and which all who hav briefly conversed with any intelligent Seventh Day Adventist know to be untrue.

The Death-Bed of a Philosopher.

Orange, N. J., is a city containing about sixteen thousand inhabitants. It is a genuin hot-bed of Roman Catholicism and Protestant orthodoxy. Although there are many Liberals in that city, they dare not utter their Liberal sentiments. Sereno E. Todd is the only person in that city who dared to open his mouth as a private and a public defender of the Liberalism now advocated by THE TRUTH SEEKER. A few weeks ago he was prostrated by congestion of the stomach. After the doctor and valet had forced quinine and brandy and other drugs down him for three weeks, the barber was called in to shave off his long beard, and to lay him out for the undertaker. At that hour some Christian friend had invited a Baptist dominie to come to the room of the dying man and pray for and with him, stating that it was a shame to allow anyone to die in a Christian land without the kind words and offices of a clergyman. Tender friends had taken their final adieu; and he had uttered (as was supposed) the last farewell. But he rallied; and his valet said, "Now take the medicin." "What is it?" asked the sick man. "It is a quinine pill." "How many hav you given me?" "About four a day." "For three weeks past?" he inquired. "I think that is about it," replied the valet. "How much brandy and whisky hav you poured down my throat?" "Perhaps a quart or more." "And perhaps a gallon," retorted the sick man. "Maybe so. I didn't measure it." "What other medicin hav you administered?" "Well, here is a lot of bottles; and I hav followed the directions of your physician." "How often hav you given me a bowl of eggnog and brandy?" "About every four hours." "Two eggs each time?" "Yes." "Twelv eggs, a quart of brandy, four quinine pills, and a dose from each of those bottles every two hours!" exclaimed the sick man. "I call a halt right here." "But you must take this medicin," said his valet. "The time has come to discontinue medicin. If you and the doctor don't know it, you can go home, and the doctor need not come again," said he.

"You're a very sick man," said the sky-pilot. "Your physician says you cannot survive long. I hav come to pray with you." "What for?" exclaimed Mr. Todd. "That you may hav a joyful and triumphant entrance where sickness and death never separate dear friends." "Do you really expect that the creator will hear and answer your petition to keep me out of sheol, or to take me to heaven, or to restore me to health?" "Yes, the Bible tells us that the prayer of faith shall save the sick." "Well, when I worshiped the unknown God, whom you adore, I offered more than twenty thousand sincere and earnest prayers, and I must say in sincerity that I never received the least intimation of an answer to one of them." "Well, would you not like to hav me pray with you?" "No, I thank you. I think no petition can be offered that will affect my destiny. Can't your God hear and answer just as well at your home as here? I am resting quietly in the embrace of the eternal energy that gave me life. I am satisfied to die as a natural philosopher. My soul is at rest. I do not wish to be disturbed at this solemn hour with appeals to spooks and senseless petitions to an unknown deity." The sky-pilot withdrew, and the sick man recovered as soon as medicin was discontinued, and he is now in usual health.

St. Paul's Potter God.

Among the many bad things in the Bible Paul contributed some of the worst. His "thorn" sours him. He hates mankind in general and women in particular. According to his own showing, the few Christians of his day were the worst people known. He seems to take spiteful pleasure in denouncing even them, and justifies his God in condemning them.

The antique philosophical God of the Hindoos, which had been partially materialized in Egypt, made a slaughtering fiend by the Hebrews, and gorgeously dramatized by the Greeks, Paul brings out in the degraded character of a potter, and exultingly exclaims: "O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Hath not the potter power over the same clay to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?" And he furnishes texts in support of predestination, reprobation, and the arbitrary, inhuman character of his God. He justifies selfish, cruel Calvinism; and there is no other way for less cruel Christians to escape its logic than by wiping out Paul.

This representation of God as a potter is amusing. It contains a trinity of absurdities. First, all the vessels of God's pottery are condemned as unsound because the first pot—Adam—fell and broke; second, they are all made imperfect for the purpose of affording the potter an opportunity to try his skill in repairing a few "chosen" specimens; third, a perfect potter, as master-workman, intentionally makes some vessels unto dishonor, and then holds the dishonorable pottery responsible for his bad work! Such nonsense as this is tolerated only in theology.

Now, according to all sacred and pious authorities, the second person of this trinity has not yet seen fit or been able to repair worth saving many cracked pitchers and pots. At the time of the sacred deluge, out of millions of earthen vessels only one nest of pots was worth saving; all the rest went by water to sheol. And then Noah got thankfully drunk and cursed his best son. On the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the eccentric Lot and a part only of one family of pots were worth preserving; all the rest of the pottery of the Cities of the Plain were sent to sheol through fire and brimstone. And then Lot got drunk, and with his daughters did some things deemed worthy of divine record.

In the time of the apostles the proportion of vessels fit for salvation was exceeding small, and evidently they were crazed. At the time of the Reformation there was scarcely a pot one could safely bet on; it was mutual condemnation all around. St. John Knox, finding all Catholic pots to be worthless, went on a loud hunt among Protestants for the "chosen." He found but few there. What an amount of contention and guesswork might hav been spared him and others had some inspired genius invented an elect-ometer by which could be discovered the foreordination mark on each piece of pottery at birth.

In St. Baxter's time only such pots as were supposed to bear the trademark elect were allowed in the sheep-fold. But the true mark was generally invisible or extensivly counterfeited; for he says, in his "Saints' Rest," "If you could ask thousands in hell what madness brought them thither, most of them would answer, 'We verily thought we were Christians already.'" On this close calculation, but few Christian pots even are finally saved, and Satan will capture an enormous amount of dishonorable pottery to rebake.

"But," exclaims some Christian pot overflowing with conceited bile, "the 'Saints' Rest' isn't scripture!" Then take a dose of pure gospel. Collector Matthew says: "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it; and wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat;" and also, "Many shall seek to enter the strait gate and shall not be able." All godly authorities sustain the lovely theory that very few specimens of old pottery will be redeemed to place as mementoes in the heaven museum. The number of "such as shall be saved" will be very small; only crazed pots like Bunyan's Christian, who plug their ears and can forsake wife and child, will be in it. Should the inquiring hymn, "Shall we know each other there?" be answered in the affirmativ, what kind of bliss will possess the man who finds that himself alone of all his family is saved? or what kind of joy will fill the mother's soul when she learns that her only child is rejected of God because it played marbles on Sunday?

It is impossible to conceive the amount of cruelty and misery wrought in the world by such fanatics as Paul. He and his potter are the corner-stones on which the Christian church was established; a church that for more than a thousand years suppressed all light of nature and reason; a church that gave Europe the Dark Ages of ignorance and superstition by enslaving all intellect; a church that used tortures and fagots for arguments; a church that has crimsoned the waters of every river and lake in Europe, and many in other lands, with human blood! a church that by intimidation still plunders both rich and poor; a church that still uses the torch of a hell in place of the light of nature! But the day is already breaking in which all intelligent men and women will unite, not in prayer to, but in earnest effort to rid the world of, this intolerant, liberty-crushing church and its man-made potter-god. L. G. Reed.

Why the Catholic Church Opposes Land Reform.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Your editorial in November 7th touching Father Ducey's virtual recantation of a mild approbation of Henry George's views, on demand of Archbishop Corrigan and in sequence of the pope's encyclical concerning the single tax and the land question, suggests a few remarks as to the reasons for hostility to the single tax by Romish ecclesiastics—remarks to which no single-tax paper would care to giv currency for fear of offending that very church which is their implacable enemy, yet to which they bow the knee, as do leading single-tax men to the Democratic party, which is also their implacable enemy. The New Testament may teach non-resistance, but it has remained for some prominent single-tax advocates to go beyond that and kiss the hands which wield the whip that descends on their backs.

Corrigan & Co. are opposed to the single tax, because, if enacted, it would be followed (if not accompanied) by other legislation requiring land to be assessed at its actual value. This could be done, as with all the small-fry personal property and other taxes abolished, the attention, not only of assessors, but of the people, would be concentrated on the land, and an irresistible demand would be made for assessment at its value. Now, the Romish church seems to make a practice of securing eligible sites at the outskirts of cities in their early stages, and in due time the cities grow beyond these sites, immensely enhancing their value. As a rule, they do not then sell them; their main object is to hav their churches, hospitals, schools, nunneries, convents, etc., in, or near, the heart of a city, or near it. In this city their places, improved and unimproved, are scattered all over, and whatever way the city grows the church is on hand to accommodate the residents. Everywhere where church property is nominally taxed the same as other property, as in this state, it is not, probably, taxed at a tenth of its actual value, nor is the land of speculators, in many cases. In one case, the land of a speculator named Peter Seculovitch was taxed at $40 a lot last year. The city wanted six of these lots for a street. Before the committee of the board of supervisors he claimed that they were worth $1,000 a lot, but that he did not want to sell them at all. They allowed him $400 a lot—ten times the amount of the assessment. Church property is not likely to be taxed at a higher rate than Seculovitch's, if as high; that is, one-twenty-fifth of its actual value. But I am not prepared to speak positivly on this point. If, however, all land (exclusiv of improvements) was taxed at its value, and all taxes laid on land alone, it is clear that Pecci, Corrigan & Co. would hav to curtail very considerably their real estate operations. And besides, the single tax, or any other means lessening or abolishing involuntary poverty, would correspondingly curtail the supply of human raw material for their factories, as also the human food for powder and politicians, by reason of increased comfort and intelligence.

As to the personal relations to the land question of Mr. Pecci and his cardinals, most of the latter reside in Rome and probably own real estate there. To double the taxation on real estate in Rome by exempting personal property and improvements, might seriously curtail their enjoyments thereof. But how far they would be affected, I hav no means of knowing. It is reasonably certain, however, that the influence of the Romish church—and to a much less extent that of some other churches—would be seriously curtailed, directly and indirectly, by the single tax, for poverty breeds ignorance, and ignorance is the food of superstition, both political and religious. At the present time, political superstitions are by far the most dangerous. Especially so is the belief that, under our present system, falsely termed "representativ government," any real representation is either actual or possible. The myth of "the people's rule" is as vile and mischievous a delusion as any religious myth in existence. But to elucidate the point in any degree needs an article by itself, which I will write in the smallest possible space, if such an article is desired.

Meanwhile, I invite the attention of your readers to the land question, for this especial reason: The fact that Pecci, Corrigan & Co. so bitterly oppose the single tax, is very strong presumptiv evidence that its enactment would, in some way, greatly weaken the hold of religious superstition upon mankind; and if so, genuin Freethinkers should become its most vigorous champions, regardless of any temporizing by Henry George with his implacable religious enemies, or of him and many of his followers with their equally implacable political ones. Alfred Cridge.

A Chinaman's Retort.

The following sharp and decisiv retort by a Chinese merchant in San Francisco was told the writer by the man who called it forth. This gentleman was a resident of Tulare county, Cal., and had been the employer of a large number of Chinamen upon a canal he had just completed. Visiting the city, he thought it proper to call upon the merchant who supplied the coolie labor for his work. The merchant was flattered by his American correspondent's visit and showed him every attention in his power. Among the many curious places in Chinatown shown him was the principal Joss-house. There he saw a tiger fabricated out of various kinds of wool and metal neatly combined, making an effigy, life-sized. The tiger's mouth was wide open, the lower jaw resting in a horizontal position to receive the votiv offerings of the faithful who worshiped at his shrine. Upon this jaw was a fine fresh porterhouse steak. The gentleman pointed to the steak and asked his host if he thought Joss would get it. The celestial instantly replied, "Alle same Jlesus Clis all d—d humbug." This shows there are Infidels to the religion of Joss the same as there are to that of Jesus. Truth.

Our Official Praying Machines.

M. M. Trumbull in the Open Court.

The extravagant irreverence which is called American humor, and which I very much enjoy, assumes its most amusing form when embodied in an official prayer-maker, a person specially elected, not by the Holy Ghost, but by his fellow-men, to act as a sort of corporation counsel for them in their dealings with God. It seems to me that spiritual indulgence touches the borders of religious dissipation when gratified by the luxury of a special chaplain, duly appointed, as in Congress, for instance, to do the praying for three or four hundred statesmen, most of them past praying for. It may be graceless levity on my part, but I never can think of an army chaplain, or a navy chaplain, or a Congress chaplain, without comparing him to one of those praying machines which I am told are used in India with great success and to the saving of immense labor. No matter how vain and useless a certain privilege may be, if "the court awards it and the law doth giv it," we immediately feel the need of it and must hav it. I once knew a colonel of cavalry—in fact, I was most intimately acquainted with him—who, being a Freethinker and an Atheist, had a cynical contempt for army chaplains, declaring them to be useless, unconstitutional, and void. The office of chaplain in his own regiment having suddenly become vacant, he became extremely anxious to fill it, and when his officers wondered why an Atheist with such contempt for chaplains should be so eager to hav one, he said, "Gentlemen! the law allows me a chaplain and I'm a-going to hav him!" And he did hav him; and for special emphasis he appointed a Presbyterian.

It must be because "the law doth giv it" that Congress indulges in the luxury of a chaplain. The position of chaplain to Congress is a very desirable one, because the wages is good, and the length of the working day has been reduced to five minutes. The praying, too, is easy and light, for a chaplain in Congress is expected to address the throne of grace in a few choice words, and in a quiet conversational tone. Surely nothing could be more genteel and even diplomatic than the prayer in reference to Chili, which was delivered yesterday in the House of Representativs, and which is printed in the papers to-day. It is courtly, as becomes the prayer of a national chaplain, and it prudently avoids committing the chaplain himself to the policy of either peace or war. It is the prayer of a chaplain laureate. "Inspire, uphold, and direct thy honored servant the president of the United States, his constitutional adviser, and members of the two houses of Congress in this solemn crisis of our history." The chaplain has adopted into his prayers the fashionable style of a Congressman when he addresses another as "the honorable member," but is it correct, as a matter of religious taste, to speak of the president as "thy honored servant" in a prayer to the almighty? Of course there can be no objection to informing the creator that under the American system of government, the members of the cabinet are the "constitutional advisers" of the president. There was much more in the prayer that might be disapproved, but its most grievous fault was that in such a "solemn crisis" it failed to pray for "peace on earth, good will to men." After all it was a consistent part of that inconsistency which provides for national chaplains and prohibits a national church.

Forceful Lectures.

KENT, O., Feb. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. John R. Charlesworth's meetings or lectures at Kent, January 24th, I regret to state, were not largely attended. But there were several circumstances that were the cause of the small attendance. First, quite a number of our friends were sick, and there was a funeral at the same time; in short, I was hardly able to go. But I must say I never heard a more forcible speaker, or more salutary arguments, bristling with facts, clothed in the most eloquent language. He is an earnest and vigorous speaker, and I predict for him a glorious future. And let me say to our Liberal friends everywhere: Giv him an opportunity. He will not disappoint you. JOSEPH HEIGHTON.

No Social or Political Reform While People Are Ecclesiastical Slaves.

CROOKSTON, MINN., Jan. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Since Mr. Putnam lectured here last fall I hav been on the TRUTH SEEKER list and read your paper with great interest. Both the pictures and the writing are instructiv, and I admire the straightforward, daring, and fearless manner in which the truth is set forth. I hope to liv long enough to see our Norwegian papers, or at least a few of them, treat matters in the same way. My idea is that as long as the people are slaves for religious superstitions and holy priests there is not much use in talking reform, either social or political.

The $9.13 is intended as payment for the books named in the inclosed list.

Thanks to Editor and Watson Heston.

Yours, OLE E. HAGEN.

CLINTON, IA., Jan. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I buoyed up myself for a good many months last year with the hope that I would be able to take a trip East to see you all, but toward the end of November I took the grip. We had Sir Edwin Arnold here on the 9th. I hear a good deal said in regard to the spread of Buddhism in New York. Do you know if it is spreading much? And is it hard to take? Or is it catching?

Fraternally, JAMES A. GREENHILL.

[Buddhism has obtained a foothold here, and will not improbably spread considerably. It is easy to take. Some of its aspects possess a certain fascination, particularly for dreaming contemplatists. Besides, it is largely composed of a profound philosophy and a code of morals. Hence it is superior to Christianity. Of course, if the spread of science be not checked it will presently put an end to the dissemination of all religions.—ED. T. S.]

Tidings of Great Joy on Hell.

CINCINNATI, IA., Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I am greatly pleased with your paper.

I wish I could hear Ingersoll the 29th on Thomas Paine. Paine's abilities and sacrifices are not appreciated by our people as they should be.

God's people are holding a protracted meeting here now. I attended last night. They are not making any progress here. People are not so easily scared as they used to be. I actually hav pity for this man here, this preacher. He believes in a real, literal hell, a hell of fire and brimstone. He thinks, too, that hell and heaven are so close together that you can look right over from one to the other. Yet he thinks those in heaven could be infinitly happy. He preached us nearly all into hell last night. He quoted that passage in the Bible about the road to heaven and hell. I cannot quote it, but the road to heaven was very narrow and few find it. The other, very broad and the gate very wide and many go in thereat. Now, is not that a beautiful belief? That is tidings of great joy. How long is such slush as that going to be taught to our children? How long will the church continue to cast a shadow over the grave?

Unaccountable Negligence.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Feb. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: We read in the holy Bible that God in the days of the holy patriarchs was often placated when in anger he visited his people for some misdemeanor. When, for instance, his anger rose against David, the man after his own heart, for taking the census (although being moved thereto, according to 2 Sam. i, 24, by himself, and in 1 Chron. xxi by Satan, and I suppose God moved Satan, so all the same), when God killed seventy thousand, David built an altar and roasted some oxen, and God forthwith ordered the slaying to stop. So when Noah got out of the ark and roasted some of his birds and a sheep or two, God's anger was appeased and he promised faithfully never to do it again. Now, with all the assurance in the holy Bible of the benign influence of the sweet savor of roasting meat on the fierce anger of the Lord, and knowing, as they do from holy writ, that God is unchangeable, the same yesterday and to-day and forever, why, standing as they do between God and man, why, in the name of mercy, do the priests and elders delay roasting some cattle that the Lord's hand may be taken off the poor grip-stricken people? Let them take heed or God will take their hair, as pious Heston forcibly delineates in the last TRUTH SEEKER. X.

Objections to the Presbyterian Railroad.

NORTHERN P CIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
MILES CITY, MONT., Jan. 29, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: As I need more enlightenment, inclosed please find money-order and send me books enumerated. I am an admirer as well as a subscriber of your journal, and wish there were many more such papers in the great United States—the freest country on the globe yet the masses are intellectually the opposit. The church, with her threats of hell-fire and her commands (that one must not inquire, but believe, as Miss Gardener expresses it, "2 x 2 = 5" and a thousand things that are contrary to the laws of nature, science, and common sense), has a hold on the masses that will take much time and labor to overcome, especially when the head of our nation is in favor of closing the Columbian Fair on Sunday—thus upholding the ignorance and superstition of the Dark Ages. But with the mighty brains there are engaged in our work we may be very hopeful and confident that "the light is breaking in the east" slowly but surely. Would that we had such men in the Senate and White House as Colonel Ingersoll and those of his caliber. To-night will be a grand one for Liberals in your city, New York, with two such giants at the helm as Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Conway. I never but once heard the colonel, but shall never forget his eloquence. I was a child then, but I could almost appreciate it then. I remember I had to resort to strategy to attend his lecture, being brought up in the Presbyterian "faith." I never liked that "route," however; too much heat at the end of it. If there is any "happy hunting-ground," I prefer to hav a Freethinker's ticket and ride in a Secular coach on a Liberal railroad and hav all the crew Radicals to the hilt.

AN OPERATOR.

Charity Is Human, Not Christian.

GOODLAND, IND., Jan. 20, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 for subscription, Heston's Illustrated Bible, and other books as named.

An incident happened in our village a few weeks ago which seems to answer the oft-repeated question of the Christian, "What good hav Infidelity or Infidels ever done for humanity?" A fellow-employee in the railway service here has been the victim of intemperance for many years. He was in the last stages, and fully realized his condition. Having expressed a desire to reform by taking the Dwight, Ill., treatment, he was confronted by a very serious obstacle—lack of money. A paper was put in circulation for the purpose of raising $100 by subscription. We hav five churches and a large and wealthy class of members. The paper was taken to all our business men indiscriminately and ten names secured. In looking over this paper imagin my surprise, and I might say pride, to learn that there was but one Christian on the list, all the others being "heathens," as the meek and lowly followers of the lamb term us. Our local paper gave these "Christian-for-revenue-only" people a good shaking-up over it. I will add that this man took the bichloride of gold treatment, came home and went to work. He has not tasted a drop since, and has no desire. The change is so great that were the Christians entitled to the credit, they would claim it a miracle.

Our village is permeated through and through with Freethinkers, but the trouble is, with the exception of four or five, they are afraid to think out aloud for fear of business boycott. When, oh, when will the day arrive when it is not such a heinous offense for a man to giv expression to his honest opinion? C. L. JACOBS.

Thomas Paine's Memory.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 3, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The one-hundred-and-fifty-fifth birthday celebration of the great author and statesman, the highest and brightest of modern times, was held in their hall at 483 Pearl street, Cleveland, O., by the Spiritual Progressiv Thought Society, Geo. J. Rundell, president. Exercises opened with music by choir and an audience that filled the large and beautiful hall secured permanently for three years. An original poem on Paine and Liberty was given by Mrs. B. B. Wilson, the pianist, who, with Prof. Geo. Chandler and Wm. Koitch, violinists, gave grand harmony in a number of trios; an address by F. G. Wilson; lecture on the "Life and Services of Paine," followed by Dr. Juliet Severance, of Chicago, who gave a fine address that gave evidence of much culture and ability to explain and eulogize the noble, truthful life of Paine in defense of truth and the right. Her delivery is clear, direct, and forcible, and, as a whole, the effort was very effectiv. Mrs. H. B. Roosa and Mr. Halloway gave fine recitations that called them out again. Miss Flossie Luce, a little girl, sang a solo well. Brief but novel speeches by W. I. Frink, I. W. Pope, Geo. Ingram, Thos. Lees, S. A. Lauderville, Thos. Black, all gave forth a high opinion of the now-honored critic and thinker. A fine vocal duet by Silas W. Edmonds, the well-known lecturer of this city, and J. E. Luce, entitled "Larboard Watch," closed the exercises at 10:30 P.M. How apt is the saying, "Truth crushed to earth will rise again." This society meets every Sunday at 2:30 P.M. for good lectures, discussion, and music. All friends and seekers of truth are welcome. Fraternally, for truth, purity, and progress, FRANK G. WILSON.

Be Buried as Befits Sensible Men.

RIDGEWAY, N. Y., Jan. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been an admirer of the Secular funerals, and the many beautiful eulogies that hav been pronounced by Ingersoll and others over the remains of some of our leading Liberal spirits when they hav been put to rest in the bosom of Mother Earth. I think the time has arrived when the Liberals of every community should respect themselvs and their own principles enough to make suitable arrangements that proper and suitable Secular services be held, and proper eulogies be pronounced, over the remains of any of their number when he goes to his last sleep, and not permit any clergyman of any denomination to take any part in the services, or go through the form of making any petition to any imaginary being. For myself, I hav made arrangements for a burial of that character, and shall make arrangements that my family shall carry them out. It takes less courage, perhaps, to make such a start in rural districts like this locality, to arrange for one's own funeral when he—the ego—shall not be present, than taking an activ part in Secular services for a brother Liberal Freethinker who has gone to his last sleep. I am ready, however, to aid in making arrangements with Freethinkers who liv within a reasonable distance of this place—say twenty or thirty miles—who sympathize with my views, so that any of us who so desire can arrange for proper Secular services conducted by laymen. If my suggestion meets with any response, I should be glad to receive letters and get in communication with each other. Forty years ago these Secular funerals were impossible. But the world moves. I hope to liv long enough to see Liberal Freethinkers in every community honor themselvs and their memories by forbidding and discouraging any mummeries of superstition to be held by any of its priests over their dead bodies. When they respect themselvs enough to do this, then will Freethought sentiments be more respected in all our land. If these thoughts meet with any response, I may hav more to say in the furtherance of this object.

GEO. L. PRATT.

But They Save Only One of Twenty Paupers They Make.

ST. ANSGAR, IA., Feb. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Albert Shaw has a paper, "A Year of General Booth's Work," in the Forum for February, an extract from which is as follows:

General Booth's great book, "In Darkest England, and the Way Out," was given to the public October, 1890. And within a few weeks General Booth was supplied with £100,000, which had been declared the minimum capital necessary for initiation of his undertaking, which was estimated to take £1,000,000 when in full blast.

General Booth's scheme is as follows: (1) The "city colony," (2) the "farm colony," and (3) the "over-sea colony." And this is what has been done in the first year of its operation:

(1) The city colony work. Eight "shelters," lodgings for men, capacity from two hundred and fifty to six hundred each, at twopence per night, often remitted at dictates of humanity. Two lodging-houses, superior character, for workingmen, at fourpence and sixpence rate. Seven "food depots," where for one penny or twopence the poor can get more nutriment than in any other way. Six "elevators," or factories, where the poor degraded is given work, food, and medical care. More than twenty "slum office posts" in different points for visiting the poor and administering relief, besides upward of thirty established in Bristol, Leeds, and Bradford.

(2) The "farm colony." It is at Hadleigh, in Essex, a few miles below London, containing about 1,200 acres of land.

(3) "Over-sea colony." This has not been operated, but has received a reserve fund of £25,000 from the £100,000.

In addition to the £101,250 contributed to the "Darkest England" fund, the Salvation Army handed over £5,000. The balance sheet of first year shows that £33,700 hav gone into the "city colony" fund, £30,550 into the "farm colony" fund, £25,000 for the "over-sea colony" reserve fund, £15,430 hav been appropriated to the "city colony" working account, and £1,433 to the "farm colony" working account. The "Darkest England" assets on the opening of the year 1892, careful deductions having been made for depreciation of buildings, furniture, machinery, and tools, are £116,104, so that the capital fund has grown in the process of use. Nearly £55,000 has gone into actual real estate. Nearly £30,000 is invested in machinery and fittings; and nearly £26,000 in colonial government stocks, this sum including the reserve for "over-sea colony."

The "elevators" are said to pay a hundred per cent a year.

Reports for the first year are as follows: More than 2,200,000 meals hav been supplied by the cheap food depots, of which 210,000 were given free from special distress fund during January and February. Nearly 100,000 breakfasts at a farthing each to poor children. Half-penny meals hav been sold to perhaps 1,200,000, and meals at one penny or more, up to fourpence, hav aggregated nearly a million and a half. Between 300,000 and 400,000 nights' lodgings hav been provided. About 4,000 persons can now be sheltered every night. Four thousand persons hav been received into the factories. Employment has been found for 5,000 men by the labor bureau. Two hundred ex-convicts hav been received in the first of the prisoners' homes, with a view to protect them and giv them work while finding places for them.

It seems to me as if the Salvation Army is the only theological society which could still remain a solid organization after throwing overboard its theological ballast.

DR. A. J. CLAUSEN.

A Kind Old Comrade Failing.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Jan. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You came very near losing another of your subscribers, and that your humble servant, La grippe having again laid hold of me and dragged me to the very verge of time, but it was "no go" this time. And right glad I am, for if I had gone at that time I should hav missed the account as given in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 16th of the flaying bee that Colonel Ingersoll had all to himself. I had read the remarks of the Rev. Mr. Dixon in my Detroit paper, and at the same time wondered if the colonel would notice them. He seems to hav thought it a good time to clip the reverend gentleman's wings. I hav always been more or less impressed with the kind-heartedness of the colonel, even to his enemies, until I read his late reply to the Rev. James M. King, the Rev. Thomas Dixon, and the Rev. Mr. Peters; but in that reply he has not left enough of them, even if the friends should pool the remains with the Rev. Dr. Buckley thrown in, to make a funeral necessary. Too bad, colonel. I should think the Rev. Mr. Dixon would be loath to again look an ass in the face. He seems to hav bit off more than he could chew. Such fellows who expect to hav a little fun at the colonel's expense not only get left but find it an expensiv luxury. It is not always safe for incompetent men to handle edged tools, as they are very apt to find out whether they are blooded stock or not.

These soft-handed gentry consider themselvs a privileged class, claiming the right to thrust their opinions and dogmas into other people's ears at all times and under all circumstances, which to me is the essence of cowardice. Only a few weeks ago I attended a funeral of a neighbor out of respect to that neighbor, not expecting to hav my belief held up to scorn before an audience; but the chance was too good not to improve it. Of course he knew that neither I nor others of the same belief as myself who were there would answer him under the circumstances. By the way, he was the same gentleman that called on me last year when I was not expected to liv. He wished to pray with me. I said to him, "Elder, do you believe God has sent this sickness upon me for my good?" He thought that might be the case. "Do you believe him competent to manage his own affairs?" "Most certainly," he said. "Do you consider yourself more competent to direct his affairs than he himself is?" "Oh, no," was his reply. "Then why do you propose to drop on your knees and try to persuade him he has made a mistake in my case—that he had better not spread it on quite so thick?" He said that perhaps I did not understand the nature of prayer. I said, "Elder, I neither pray for myself, nor do I wish to lay myself under obligation to anyone else to do it for me. I appreciate your good-will all the same, but I would not turn my hand over for the prayer of the world." He said he could pray for me in his room. I said, "I know of no law to prevent you; but, my dear sir, I am past praying for. Please don't do it. It is a humbug." I hav never thought my case kept him awake nights; possibly I am mistaken.

I am much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER in its new dress. I think it superlativ. I wish I was able to do more for the cause it represents. I am doing what little I can in a quiet way, keeping my books and papers on the wing all the time, trying to cultivate a desire for such literature. And upon the whole I think I am making some progress—not as rapidly as I could wish, but still as fast as I could expect under the circumstances.

Yours truly, JAS. P. DICKINSON.
